CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTIETH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

was authorized to do, and the Congress of the United States saw fit without a dissenting voice to remunerate this attorney properly for that service. Such a case as that may occur at any point, in any one of the Territories of the Union.

Then comes the District of Columbia; and this presents a most important matter.

By the act of August 5, 1886, page 335, to provide for protecting the interests of the United States in the Potomac River Flats, proceedings were begun by the proper officers of the Government.

To the bill filed by the Attorney-General, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, under section 1, there have been thirty-nine answers, making practically thirty-nine suits.

The questions involved go back one hundred years, and involve claims to titles to land and water for miles up and down the river. The research and labor necessary for a thorough examination of the records of the War, Treasury, and Interior Departments, the court records and papers on file in the Congressional Library have consumed months.

The undivided attention of an attorney, able and expert in the matters under investigation, will be needed to look after these suits, otherwise the Government will sustain heavy pecuniary loss. The best lawyers in the District are employed in the defense.

The civil business of the United States attorney's office of the District of Columbia has absolutely outgrown the capacity of the office to deal with it.

More than sixty cases are now on the docket, the force being insufficient; and the delay therefrom has been most injurious.

Many of these suits are against wealthy corporations, who are assisted by the ablest counsel in Washington. In some instances the Government is pitted against leading railroad companies, which, by reason of the insufficiency of the force in the United States district attorney's office, have every advantage. Unless Congress comes to the relief, the Government will be made to suffer enormous losses.

Now, in connection with that, as an illustration of the growing importance of that Department I hold in my hand a copy of the bill in equity in a single, solitary case relating to the North Carolina Cherokees, which has recently been filed by the Department of Justice, and is now pending in the court, embracing seventy pages of closely printed manuscript in the bill alone. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly manifest that no district attorney will be able to take up the class of litigation to which I have called the attention of the House and dispose of it to the best interest of the Government without the assistance of counsel.

I have but little information as to the character of the district attorneys in the different States of the Union. I assume that they are of the highest order of talent, of the very best men; but any man who has had experience in a court will see the embarrassment which must necessarily occur if the district attorney is compelled to take up and dispose of the current business of the court and in addition to that have these suits involving millions of acres of the public domain and millions of dollars to the Government without any competent assistance.

The Department of Justice, I believe, asked for $40,000 in their estimate. It was disallowed. They now come and ask upon this bill that you give them $20,000 in addition to what you have given; and I think in view of the explanation which I have now made, which should perhaps have been more fully made to the Committee on Appropriations than was heretofore made or than came out in the discussion of the subject upon this floor some weeks ago. In view of these facts, and in view of this additional work and accumulated work upon the Department of Justice of this high and important character, involving so much to the Government, that the Congress of the United States ought not to embarrass and cripple the Department, but on the contrary ought to give it the necessary assistance to carry on this work in a way that will be successful.

In conclusion, I have only this to say, for the Committee of the Whole as well as the Committee on Appropriations, that in presenting these statements I do not know anything about them except as they have been left by my colleague [Mr. OATES] with a request for me to present them to the House. I assume that they are correct, though I have no knowledge on that fact. But what I do insist is that in view of the explanation now made there should be no question as to the action of the Committee on Appropriations about making this appropriation.

What we all want to do, on both sides, is to do right, and the disposition of all parties concerned is to do right when we ascertain what it is. Now the Department of Justice has placed these things before the Committee of the Whole and it is for the committee to say itself and for the Committee on Appropriations to say, whether or not in view of this increasing labor they will make an appropriation which will enable that Department to preform it in a proper manner, and with these observations I will close, stating that when the proper place is reached I will offer an amendment with that view.

[Mr. STONE, of Missouri, addressed the committee. He withholds his remarks until they have been concluded. They will be found complete in the succeeding day's proceedings.]

Mr. BURNES. Will my friend yield to me for the purpose of moving that the committee now rise?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Certainly. I presume that I will retain the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the gentleman will be entitled to the floor when the committee again resumes its session.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the general deficiency bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HERBERT. The committee of conference on the Navy appropriation bill instruct me to make a report on the bill (H. R. 10556) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

I ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee be confirmed and that certain amendments therein specified be non-concurred in, and others concurred in, and that a further conference be asked with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be some brief statement, at least, of the nature of these amendments.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know anything about the bill; but I would like to have some little information as to the amendments of the Senate. How much is the increase?

Mr. HERBERT. The increase by the Senate is about $240,000.

Mr. ROGERS. What for?

Mr. HERBERT. For the construction of a practice vessel for the Naval Academy. That is the principal one. The committee is unanimous in its report.

Mr. CANNON. Let this report be printed, and let us have some time to examine it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman state how much is the largest item upon which non-concurrence is recommended?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not remember the exact figures——

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that the gentleman had better have the direction of the House as to non-concurrence in some of these amendments.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the report will be inserted in the RECORD, so that we may have an opportunity of examining it, and the gentleman can call it up Monday morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection this report will be printed in the RECORD and lie over for the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report (by Mr. HERBERT) is as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, who have had under consideration the Senate amendments to H. R. 10556, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes," submit the following report and recommendations:

There were seventy-five amendments reported in the bill as it came from the Senate. The committee, after full consideration of the same, recommend concurrence in the amendments numbered respectively as follows:

Amendments numbered 1, 2, 9, 10, 12, and 13.

Also, concurrence in Senate amendment numbered 16, with amendments in line 315, after the word "Mexico;" so as to make the remainder of the line read: "and the South Atlantic coast for navy-yards and dry-docks, and for."

They also recommend concurrence in amendments numbered 17, 19, 26, 30, 31, 32, 33, 36, 42, 43, 44, 50, 52, 54, 61, and 69.

The committee recommend non-concurrence in the amendments as follows:

Amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 14, 15, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 34, 35, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 53, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75.

They also recommend that line 977 be amended by inserting after the word "construction" the words "steam machinery and armament."

Also, that the words "construction and steam machinery," where they occur in line 1031, be stricken out.

Also, that the word "or," where it occurs in lines 1033 and 1035, be stricken out, and that the word "and" be inserted in lieu thereof in each line.

Also, that the words "with their engines, boilers, and machinery," be inserted in line 1033, after the word "Congress" and before the word "and."

Also, that the word "armament," in line 1037, be stricken out.

They recommend concurrence in amendment numbered 75 with the following amendments, that is to say, strike out the words "and armament" in line 1042, insert between the words "Annapolis" and "to," in line 1044, the words "except when in emergencies it may be used for other purposes," and by inserting "sixty" in the place of "seventy-five" in line 1047.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ELMIRA, N. Y.

Mr. FLOOD. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9380) for the erection of a public building at the city of Elmira, N. Y.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide a site and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office, and for other Government uses, at the city of Elmira, N. Y. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $75,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $75,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of New York shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $75,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of the first section of this act.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Pending that, I understand that objection has been withdrawn to the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the report be read in this case, subject to the right of objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us dispose of this other matter; objection is withdrawn.

Mr. HERBERT. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois withdraws his objection to the request for a committee of conference.

Mr. BURROWS. I think that the report ought to be printed and lie over until Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will be read.

The report (by Mr. NEAL) was read, as follows:

According to the census report of 1880 the population of the city of Elmira was 20,641. It is now estimated to contain a population of 25,000 or 30,000. It is the geographical, commercial, and business center of the southern tier of counties of New York, and is the distributing point for mails to most of the offices and towns in the territory embraced in these counties, extending from 75 to 100 miles in all directions from Elmira. It has extensive business and manufacturing interests.

The post-office at Elmira is the depository for the fourth-class post-offices in the counties of Chemung, Schuyler, and Steuben, being more than one hundred and fifty in number.

The number of employés in the post-office at Elmira, including clerks and letter-carriers, is twenty-one.

The business transacted through this office during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, is shown in the appendix hereto annexed.

The gross receipts of the office for the same time were $48,247.37. The net revenue from the office was $27,912.

The committee are of the opinion that a public building should be erected at Elmira, but are further of the opinion that a public building can be erected there, including purchase of site, which will be sufficient to meet the present and reasonably prospective needs of the public service at that place for the sum of $75,000. The committee therefore report the accompanying bill as a substitute and recommend that it do pass, and that the original bill be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is simply for a post-office, and I would suggest that $50,000 ought certainly to be sufficient. I ask the gentleman to accept that amount.

Mr. FLOOD. Very well, I am willing to accept that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, under the previous order the House stands adjourned until 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 3400) for the relief of Maria G. Dunbar; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present amendments to the bill (H. R. 8990) to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations, which I ask to have printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. If there is no objection, I should like to have the amendments printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The amendments will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Is there objection to their appearing in the RECORD? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

The amendments are as follows:

First. Strike out the word "commissioners," in line 5, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the word "judges;" and strike out the word "chairman," in line 6, of same page, and insert in lieu thereof the words "presiding judge."

Second. Strike out the word "commissioners," in line 9, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the word "judges."

Third. Strike out the word "commissioner," in line 16, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "judge."

Fourth. Strike out the word "commissioners," in lines 17 and 18, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "judges."

Fifth. Strike out the word "commissioners," in line 1, section 2, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the word "judges."

Sixth. Strike out lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, of page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"First. All claims for Indian depredations now on file in the Interior Department, or pending before Congress; and all such other claims which shall hereafter be presented in pursuance of this act, or any other act of Congress or treaty with any Indian tribe: Provided, That in determining the liability of the United States to pay such claims, or any part thereof, the question of limitation as to time and manner of presenting them, as prescribed by statute, shall be waived by the court."

Seventh. Strike out after the word "determination," in line 20, section 2, page 2, the following:

"The aforesaid court shall not consider any claim which has been heard and rejected by any Department or officer of the Government, authorized by law to adjudicate the same."

Or in the event that the amendment last proposed should not be adopted, then as an alternative the following amendment is proposed:

Insert after the word "rejected," in line 21, page 2, section 2, the words "or allowed;" and also insert after the word "same," in line 23, section 2, page 3, the following words:

"And all claims which have been heretofore heard and allowed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and Secretary of the Interior under any law of the United States are hereby declared to be valid existing claims against the United States, subject to appropriation by Congress."

Eighth. Strike out the word "commissioners," in line 26, section 2, page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the word "judges."

Ninth. Strike out the word "commissioners," in line 6, section 3, page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the word "judges."

Tenth. Strike out the word "commissioners," in line 10, section 3, page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the word "judge;" also in line 11, same section and page, strike out the word "commissioners," and insert in lieu thereof the word "judges."

Eleventh. Strike out the word "Secretary," in line 7, section 4, page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the word "Secretaries;" and insert after the word "War," in line 7, section 4, page 5, the words "and the Treasury;" and strike out in line 9, section 4, page 5, the following words:

"The Department of War;" and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "their several departments."

Twelfth. Strike out the word "commissioners," in lines 32 and 33, section 4, page 6, and insert in lieu thereof the word "judges;" also strike out the word "commissioners," in line 35, same section and page, and insert in lieu thereof the word "judges."

Thirteenth. Insert after the word "be," in line 11, page 5, section 4, the following words: "adjudged and determined, being."

Fourteenth. Insert a period after the word "involved," in line 20, section 4, page 5; and strike out the word "and," after the word "involved," in line 20 of same page, and insert in lieu thereof the words, "the petition."

Fifteenth. Insert after the word "agents," in line 23, section 4, page 5, the following words: "or other officers."

Sixteenth. Insert after the words "United States," in line 23, page 8, the following words: "stating the amount allowed to each claimant."

GEORGE W. SEAVER.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Mrs. N. S. Seaver, widow of George W. Seaver, deceased, late a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, an amount equal to six months' salary as such clerk aforesaid; said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHARLOTTE, N. C.

Mr. RANSOM. I move that the Senate request the House of Representatives to return the bill (S. 907) to provide for the erection of a public building at Charlotte, N. C., with the message of the Senate thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House requested the Senate to return to the House the concurrent resolution for printing 39,000 copies of the third annual report of the Commissioner of Labor.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1914) for the relief of Mary E. Hopkins.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following concurrent resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A concurrent resolution to print, and 50,000 additional copies of, a special report on the white scale and other scale insects affecting the orange and other fruit trees in California;

A concurrent resolution to print 5,000 copies of the report of Capt. M. A. Healy, United States revenue marine, upon the cruise of the revenue steamer Corwin in the Arctic Ocean in the year 1884, and its accompanying documents and illustrations;

A concurrent resolution for the printing, and 20,000 additional copies, of a second edition of the special report of the Department of Agriculture on insects affecting the orange;

A concurrent resolution for the printing of the report of the Smithsonian Institution and of the National Museum for the years ending June 30, 1886 and 1887, in two octavo volumes for each year, 16,000 extra copies of each;

A concurrent resolution for the printing of 3,000 copies of the report of Lieut. Charles C. Rogers, United States Navy, on the Panama Canal, including illustrations and maps, bound in cloth;

A concurrent resolution for the printing of 5,000 copies of the report of Capt. M. A. Healy, United States revenue marine, upon the cruise of the revenue steamer Corwin in the Arctic Ocean in the year 1885, and its accompanying documents and illustrations; and

A concurrent resolution for the printing of 100,000 copies of a comparative statement embodying the present tariff law (act of March 3, 1883) with proposed amendments of the Mills bill, to be prepared by the Committee on Ways and Means, to be printed for the use of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 206) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1888, entitled a "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business that order is closed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10540, being the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to offer three or four amendments from the Committee on Appropriations.

On page 115, after line 25, I move to insert:

To enable the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate to provide suitable rooms for the use of the folders of the Senate, $150. And he is authorized to lease such rooms for the space of four months.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 108, after line 23, I move to insert:

Penitentiary in Wyoming Territory: For completion and necessary repairs of penitentiary building, in addition to the amount appropriated in the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 4, 1886, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 117, after line 6, I move to insert:

To enable the Architect of the Capitol to protect the paintings in the Rotunda by suitable railing or wire netting, in his discretion, $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 119, line 25, in the items for printing and binding for the Departments, I move to strike out "four" before the word "thousand," and insert "eight;" so as to read:

For the Department of Labor, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 20, on page 117, I ask unanimous consent, as the amendment there has already been agreed to, to change the sum from $2,213,000, which I believe is now in the bill, to $2,217,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 117, line 20, in the appropriations for "public printing and binding," after the words "two hundred and," it is proposed to strike out "thirteen" and insert "seventeen;" so as to read:

And for all the necessary materials which may be needed in the prosecution of the work, $2,217,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOWEN. I move to amend the bill on page 63, line 6, after the word "dollars," by inserting what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 63, line 6, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

For the purpose of investigating the extent to which the arid region of the United States can be redeemed by irrigation, and the segregation of the irrigable lands in such arid region, and for the selection of sites for reservoirs and other hydraulic works necessary for the storage and utilization of water for irrigation and the prevention of floods and overflows, and to make the necessary maps, including the pay of employés in field and in office, the cost of all instruments, apparatus, and materials, and all other necessary expenses connected therewith, the work to be performed by the Geological Survey, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $250,000. All titles to the public lands hereafter acquired shall be subject to the right of the United States to make reservations for reservoirs for storing water and for rights of way for ditches and canals for the purpose of irrigation.

Mr. BOWEN. I desire to be heard briefly on the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to say a word before the Senator from Colorado proceeds. That amendment, I believe, was reported by the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I am not certain that the amendment is in order, and therefore I reserve the right to make a point of order, but will hear the Senator from Colorado before making it.

Mr. BOWEN. Mr. President, in offering this amendment I desire the Senate to understand, and understand with great distinctness, that I am not engaged in the performance of an act of merely perfunctory character, because the very reverse is true. I am very much in earnest about it, and do most sincerely hope the Senate will give it the fair and candid consideration which the great importance of the subject demands.

This amendment has failed to receive the approval of the Committee on Appropriations, but I have reason to believe the committee is not a unit in this regard. Be this, however, as it may, I now bring it before this body, not for the purpose of antagonizing the committee, which I doubt not stands ready to be convinced, but with the view of taking the judgment of the Senate upon the subject.

It requires no argument to establish a universally accepted truth; and when I assert that if each and every individual in this country owned in fee a parcel of land it would not only conduce to the prosperity and happiness of each but would likewise constitute one of the most potential elements of strength to the Government, I consider I am simply enunciating one of those universally accepted truths. Assuming that I am, I will not pause to dwell at length upon the reasons that lead to such acceptance.

Let it suffice to simply call attention to the rapidly increasing population in our country and to the dense masses in our already overcrowded cities, together with the additional fact that these conditions exist in a country which is, comparatively speaking, only in its infancy.

Then let me ask all thoughtful persons to consider the question as to how long it will be before additional provision must be made for the efflux of people from the overcrowded portions of our country. So long as we have a surplus of unoccupied land we will not feel the pressure of an augmenting population; but, sir, let me say now that we have nearly reached the culminating point where we have no such land surplus. To make my meaning clear I wish it understood that I do not speak of the quantity of land considered necessary in the older countries of the world, where people are crowded together like sheep, eke out a bare existence, and live and die in utter hopelessness of ever bettering their condition, but that I do speak of what is necessary to our own people, who never have been, and I hope never will be, accustomed to such conditions; people born to freedom, constitutionally independent, and wholly unused to the cramped and pinched and pitiable surroundings of people in less favored lands.

With these qualifications and explanations I repeat what I said before, that our available surplus lands are well-nigh all appropriated; and I may add that the time is nearly on us when, if the people who may desire to secure and build homes of their own are to have such opportunities, we must do our part of the work here. It is idle to say wait until the exigency arises. The Bible says:

The wise man forseeth evil and avoideth it; the fool goeth on and is punished.

Let us heed this condensed wisdom and do that which, to be useful at all, must be done in apt time.

To those whose lives and lines of thought and effort have carried them away from an investigation of the question it may, and no doubt will, be a matter of surprise when I state that the "arid" lands of this country embrace, exclusive of Alaska, about four-tenths or nearly one-half of the entire area of the United States! Such, however, is true.

By arid lands I mean all land which is non-productive without irrigation; and this classification embraces the eastern portions of California, Oregon, and Washington, and nearly the whole of Idaho, Utah, Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming, and Montana, while the western portions of Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Texas are in some seasons seriously affected by drought.

Habituated as we are to contemplate the vastness of the territory embraced within the limits of the United States in a general sort of way, sufficiently magnificent in its proportions to constitute a score of empires—ay, a world within itself—we swell with pride and satisfaction at the thought that this is our country; yet we find our enthusiasm dampened when the cold fact is announced that if we have to depend upon nature for the one single element of moisture we could not on nearly one-half of all this vast domain raise a single bushel of wheat.

On the other hand the evidence rises to the dignity of proof, of absolute conclusiveness, that whenever and wherever this one missing link in the great chain of conditions essential to success in agriculture is supplied these verdureless deserts change as if by magic and become the garden spots of the world. Look, for example, at the State of Colorado. Only thirty years ago the first movement of people to that country was made; they were not looking for farms, but for gold, and had no thought of engaging in agriculture. The plains were dry and desolate and the general outlook was anything but encouraging; and very many returned to the States. Some, however, remained, and little by little agriculture by means of irrigation began to engage the attention and efforts of the people. It was a success. Instead of watching the clouds and hoping for rain, they found they could do their own raining whenever they pleased by simply turning the water from their ditches. They also learned that their seemingly barren land was rich in all the elements essential to vegetable growth. From these small beginnings the interest grew with marvelous rapidity, and what do we see to-day?

Why, sir, wherever water can be commanded we see as successful agriculture as the sun of heaven shines upon anywhere, and that, too, right at the door of one of the finest mining regions in the world. These two great interests combined are building up a veritable empire. To say nothing of the lesser cities, towns, and villages—and we have them by the scores and hundreds—look at Denver, the "Queen City of the Plains," with its hundred thousand inhabitants now, and still moving forward with giant strides in her race for a quarter of a million in the near future, and then remember that only thirty years ago—at a period when some now here were even then serving the country as members of Congress—the sole occupants of the site were the buffalo, the antelope, the cayote, and the jack-rabbit; and that without water for irrigation the original occupants would still be holding the fort. What has been done there in the way of material development can be done to a greater extent all over the arid regions.

Is it necessary to bring forward an array of arguments or waste a moment's time to convince the Senate of the wisdom of reclaiming these lands? I think not. Senators may honestly differ as to when and how it shall be done; but there can be no dispute as to the general proposition that it should be done.

With equal confidence I assert that there can be no dispute as to the fact that the engineering part of this great work must be done first, and this is just what the amendment now under consideration contemplates.

It is well for us all to understand that the problem of irrigation is neither new nor tentative, for it is a fact that about half the cultivated land on the face of the globe, including parts of Mexico, Central and South America, Holland, Spain, Belgium, Portugal, Sicily, and Greece, and generally the Mediterranean coasts north of the rainless regions of Africa, Moravia, Poland, and parts of Russia, also in Syria, Egypt, and in many parts of Persia, India, and China, is utilized by that means; that without water held and controlled for that purpose, such lands would be as useless for agricultural purposes as the lava beds, and the present population of the world could scarcely subsist at all.

The subject has received world-wide attention for centuries upon centuries, and the volumes of books and reports on the subject would make an extensive library wherein all the phases of the subject are discussed and made clear. Hence I say it is not a mere experiment, but a tangible, fixed fact. I will not, however, pause to refer to authorities, but content myself by simply stating facts.

True it is that a large proportion of our arid lands will forever remain so, and for various reasons. Some are so situated that water can not be taken to them; some are so broken, uneven, and abrubt that irrigation would be impossible, even with the water at hand for the purpose, besides divers and sundry other causes affecting particular conditions. Still, the proportion which can be redeemed and made useful is sufficiently large to make their reclamation a matter of profound interest, especially when it is considered that when supplied with water these lands are the finest producers of cereals, vegetables, and fruits in the world. This is true, because plant-food has been accumulating on these lands undiluted by water for hundreds of years.

Irrigation in its primitive state involves only the utilization, by means of simple ditches, of the water streams existing in proximity to the lands to be cultivated. Such lands are first settled upon and improved, but as the country grows in population, we find that large canals are excavated, beginning higher up the more important streams and laid out with but slight grades. Through these the water is conducted for long distances and further back from the streams, thus covering larger areas of country, and making the cultivation of the soil on all lower ground feasible. These canals are sometimes constructed through and by the combination of the several land owners, sometimes by persons or corporations of larger means, who sell water rights to such as have not engaged, or do not desire to engage, in making these canals. From these main canals the water is diverted and measured by means of gates and weirs, and carried through ditches to the several places where it is needed, and there distributed broadcast, or through the furrows over the fields. The irrigating season, as a rule covers but few months in the year, and for the balance of the time the water is practicably wasted, running off through its natural channels.

In the region of country which I have already designated as "arid" the two methods I have already described are now being used, but practical experience has taught us that there is not enough water, thus managed and handled, to irrigate all our arid lands. Therefore, we are preparing for another advanced movement, looking to the storage of water in vast reservoirs to be filled during the parts of the year when the waters are not being used for irrigating purposes, but left running off to waste as already mentioned—a period embracing about three-quarters of each year—and we now appear before Congress with this purpose in view, asking that the great "catchment" basins be selected, surveyed, and withdrawn from market, to the end that they may hereafter be used for the only purpose for which they are of any use whatever. Without entering into any nice calculation, sufficient is known to warrant the assertion that the quantity of water which could thus be saved and stored up would be ample to redeem every acre of our arid lands.

This policy once adopted, various points are to be well considered in the execution of its details, chief among which is the question of evaporation. Water stored away in our lower altitudes and drier atmospheres loses largely from this source, hence the reservoir sites must be selected high up the mountains and nearer the sources of our streams. The loss from evaporation varies from 10 to 50 per cent., perhaps more. The higher up, where the atmosphere is more humid, the less, the lower down, the more. This, however, and other matters are details which I will not now discuss. Let it suffice to say that they are all well understood.

There has been an objection raised that, if these reservoir sites are surveyed and selected, the lands will be appropriated by speculators and land sharks. Allow me to say that there is not in existence a land law under which such a thing could be possible, and that I am not only willing but anxious that all necessary safeguards be adopted to render such things impossible.

We are not asking very much; nothing in fact to speak of when considered in connection with other appropriations. Look, for instance, at the river and harbor bill: Four hundred and thirty-two distinct items of appropriation, besides over five hundred and fifty more wherein the Secretary of War is directed to cause surveys to be made for various purposes, covering in all over $22,000,000 for the present fiscal year.

I take no exceptions to any of the projects, but simply mention these facts to show that as a comparative proposition we do present one which, all things considered, possesses very great merit, and I may fairly add that in my opinion, while I sit here and vote millions for the purposes suggested by you and claimed to be useful and meritorious, I may in all reason and good faith ask for the pittance covered by my amendment, which is to be expended, not for the benefit alone of the people of that section of country, but for the grander purpose of furnishing homes for the homeless all over this broad land.

Is this desirable? Is it a laudable aspiration? Look around you and contemplate existing facts, paying no heed for the moment to the future, and what do we see in the older settled parts of this country? The prosperous farmer in the Eastern or Middle States raises his family of stalwart sons and they become past masters of the art of agriculture. The time arrives when these boys desire to start life for themselves, and, possibly possessed of a few dollars of patrimony, go West to seek new homes in new lands. In time they have families of their own.

They are the types of that American progress which causes the earth to yield up her hidden riches, which builds school-houses and churches, that erects the forge, the factory, and the mill, standing everywhere throughout the countless towns, villages, and hamlets of our happily endowed land. This is the history of our great development inward; but the time will come when this progress must be checked through the gradual processes of absorption of our arable public domain. What shall we do to anticipate? Or shall we anticipate at all?

We do not want money to improve our rivers, but we do want it to save their waters for the purposes I have indicated, thus being enabled to furnish our portion of commerce and to make subsistence so plentiful at home that nature's great store-houses of mineral wealth may be opened up and their increased products added to the world's wealth.

The appropriations for the Geological Survey are contained in the bill now under consideration, else I might well have insisted on placing this amendment upon the river and harbor bill, because I firmly believe that, so far at least as the Lower Mississippi River is concerned, that region would be more thoroughly protected from floods and overflows by a perfect reservoir system than by all the millions that have been and still are being expended there. Let me for a moment read what Major Powell says on this point. I consider him as good authority as any in all this land. I read from his recent report to the Secretary of the Interior:

> The development of irrigation along the base of the Rocky Mountains is of double importance because of its influence on the agriculture of the Lower Mississippi. To store up the water of the Missouri and its main affluents for the purpose of irrigation is to diminish the volume of that flood of the Lower Mississippi, which is most destructive by reason of its recurring in the heart of the farming season. Moreover, the great difficulty of the problem of the Lower Mississippi arises from the fact that the river normally makes a deposit there, thus clogging its course and giving to its channel an unstable position. The principal source of the sediment is the Missouri River, and it is carried forward chiefly during floods. With abolition of great Missouri floods the sedimentary load of the Lower Mississippi would be diminished, and the scouring power of the less-loaded floods from the Ohio and Upper Mississippi would establish for the Lower Mississippi a lower grade and a deeper channel. For every acre reclaimed to agriculture in Montana another acre will be reclaimed in Louisiana; and, in general, all land redeemed by irrigation on the great plains will be equaled by the lands redeemed from floods in the great valley of the Lower Mississippi.

I can add nothing which will strengthen his statement, which for clearness and perspicuity stands unrivaled.

Mr. President, I now come to the last point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate.

The Congress and Executive are already committed to this work. At this very session of Congress the Secretary of the Interior has been directed by joint resolution, duly passed by both branches of Congress and approved by the President—

> By means of the Director of the Geological Survey to make an examination of that portion of the arid regions of the United States where agriculture is carried on by means of irrigation, as to the natural advantages for the storage of water for irrigating purposes, with the practicability of constructing reservoirs, together with the capacity of the streams and the cost of the construction and capacity of reservoirs, and such other facts as bear on the question of storage of water for irrigating purposes.

The proposed appropriation is for the purpose of carrying this joint resolution into effect. Without the appropriation we had just as well never have passed the resolution.

Will Congress put itself in such an attitude? Sir, one of the well-founded accusations preferred against our Government is that our executive and legislative branches are inert and indisposed to promptly recognize and aid in the advancement of scientific projects. This may be accounted for by the facts that our civilization is new, compared with that of the Old World, and that our resources seem to be so limitless and our people are so actively engaged in countless enterprises they have little time to pause and consider that a period must arrive when lines for the future must be distinctly drawn.

It is beyond question that the inventors of the steam-engine and magnetic telegraph pleaded vainly throughout long and weary years for Governmental aid in furthering or developing their discoveries. The inventors of the various implements and armaments which, during the late civil war, revolutionized the art and science of modern warfare were coldly, if not cruelly, treated by our Government, and other inventors in the same line are to-day meeting with like indifference, if not wholly repelled. It is a struggle always for recognition, and this is the effort I am making to-day in advocacy of this comparatively new—to us—but no less important proposition.

We appropriate vast sums in aid of river and harbor improvements. About $150,000,000 have been expended since 1789 on these improvements, whether meritorious or otherwise, but I do not doubt that valuable returns have been rendered therefor in the advancement of our coastwise and internal water commerce. Much of this outlay has been of experimental nature, in aid of projects advocated and recommended by our Army engineers, and Congress has not been illiberal in this particular. I claim the application of the principles underlying river and harbor improvements to the project so urgently recommended by the authorities of the Geological Survey, civil engineers of world-wide reputation, who should know whereof they speak.

The appropriation urged is strictly within the line of economy, because it is based upon considerations of the highest national importance and public polity, directly and indirectly affecting the happiness and welfare of the American people, for whom homes are needed, with all their concomitants of civilization and contributive wealth.

If the general reclamation of our arid lands can be accomplished, and of this there can be no reasonable doubt, the amount asked to inaugurate the experiment is but the veriest trifle. We can never attain success by standing idle, advocating a proposition involving important national considerations, and yet deliberately closing the doors of the Treasury against the necessary outlay. A wise policy demands the very reverse action.

The great and growing West is blossoming like the rose, but there are vacant places, deserts which can be made oases. The people's demands for homes must constantly increase proportionately with our increase of population. The public domain is being rapidly absorbed, and there is no provision for the future. The end must come and the door shut in the faces of our hardy, enterprising settlers, unless we can extend our area by reclaiming the arid lands. There will be no homestead or pre-emption privileges when the land offices are closed, and what then? Let the people and let the Senate ponder and reply.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I regard this as the most useful and important item of appropriation which has been presented to this Congress.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, has the question of order been made and decided? The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations raised a question of order, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, stated that he reserved the point of order, to decide whether or not to submit it hereafter.

Mr. BECK. So the right to make it will not be lost if the debate goes on?

Mr. STEWART. The people of the United States have not until recently been called upon to consider the question of irrigation, but it always has been a leading question among civilized people. It would be safe to estimate that two-thirds at least, certainly one-half, of all the agriculture which has been practiced by man from the beginning has been by the aid of irrigation. Ancient and modern Egyptians were and are compelled to irrigate to raise any crop. Italy and Austria also irrigate, although in those countries there are places where crops can be raised without irrigation.

Irrigation is practiced in more than half of France. It is absolutely necessary in the greater part of Asia. The Eastern empires of old supported vast populations by irrigation. Two hundred and fifty million people in India are generally supported by irrigation. Irrigation has been practiced on this hemisphere from the beginning. In Mexico and South America a large portion of the country requires irrigation to produce crops.

We have acquired a large section of country requiring irrigation. It is admitted that about two-fifths of the area of the United States, excepting Alaska, requires irrigation.

We have thus far proceeded to treat all land as if it were arable land, to survey it in the same way and to dispose of it under the same laws, except the statute known as the desert-land law, which is imperfect. The design of this law was good, and it has worked tolerably well, but it needs some modifications. Aside from that there has been no legislation by Congress looking to irrigation, except a general law which was passed in 1866 conferring rights to ditches and canals on the public lands for mining and agricultural purposes, and recognizing the use of water for those purposes.

There has been some incidental legislation in regard to that matter, such as a recognition of the difference between arable lands, timber lands, mineral lands, etc. In the various acts providing for the Geological Survey the fact that there is land requiring irrigation is recognized. The various acts making appropriations for the Geological Survey have provided for the classification of the lands, such as require irrigation and such as do not, such as are desert, such as are agricultural, and such as are mineral lands. You have appropriations in this bill for the Geological Survey, for topographical and geological surveys, and kindred subjects, nearly $600,000.

The most important part of this geological survey is the topographical survey. That is the foundation of the geological survey. You must have the topography in order to give the geology. This survey of the country for the purposes of ascertaining its topography and geology commenced when I was a member of the Senate many years ago. An appropriation was made for the purpose of a geological survey along the line of the Pacific Railroad. Senator Conness, of California, proposed an amendment to the Army appropriation bill for that purpose, and I aided him to secure its adoption. I afterwards secured an appropriation to enable the engineers of the War Department to go on with the work, and it was conducted for a time under Lieutenant Wheeler. His was a very valuable topographical and geological work.

It was subsequently taken from the Engineer Department, which may or may not have been a mistake, for our young Army officers ought to have this exercise, and it would be for the benefit of the Army if they had it, although it is under the charge of a very competent and enthusiastic man, who goes into it with all his soul; and he has so acted that there is a general recognition of the usefulness of his work.

Congress has been making annual appropriations, and in this bill, as I before remarked, there are about $600,000 for this bureau. Strange as it may seem, while this work does make valuable books, good drawings, and pictures which are exceedingly fine and very instructive, while it collects good information which the world appreciates highly, yet the work in the field stops at the point where immediate necessity begins. It leaves out the most important part of such a survey by refraining from that which is needed to make it of practical utility for people desiring to make homes.

It should not only show the geology and topography, but it should show what lands are arable and where ditches and reservoirs should be made for the purpose of reclaiming such arable lands by irrigation. That is of the first importance. The topography must be determined, and that is the principal expense, while the matters relating to irrigation are vastly more important. There is no provision for practical segregation, so that the people can know what land can be brought under cultivation and what can not.

This amendment provides for the appropriation of $250,000 for the purpose of enabling the work now in progress in the field to be extended so as to provide homes for the people. The amendment is germane. Eighty per cent. of the proposed work is topography, the same work in which the bureau is now engaged, and for which a large amount is already appropriated in the bill. In fact it is of the same character precisely. It is adding to the information for which we are already paying $600,000 a year.

In after years the scientific world may be benefited by the Geological Survey, but what we want now is immediate benefit to the country. Let me appeal to the Senate to appropriate money for this purpose now. If we do not proceed with this at once it will be too late. This matter will not admit of delay. We can not delay this part of the survey for this reason, and I want the Senate to understand this particularly.

The ranges of mountains in this country have, as a rule, flat places, lakes, swamps, and places covered with grass at high altitudes, from which water is discharged through narrow gorges easily dammed. They are very numerous at the heads of all the great and small streams, some of them known as parks, some as lakes, and others as mountain meadows.

While these places are not fit, as a rule, to make homes, being too high, so that people can not live there during the winter on account of the deep snows, still cattle-men take stock there in summer, and they are using every means to get title so that they can make summer ranges. There are many places where they have already acquired title to these reservoir sites.

It is necessary to have these reservoirs in this region, because the snow and the rain come in the winter, and if it is not saved then it is lost forever. In the spring when the snow is melting in every locality I venture to say 95 per cent. of the water runs to waste within sixty days. In the winter it lies there in snow, but in the spring when the snow goes off it goes in a flow, which is injurious to the country below, injurious to the Mississippi Valley, and injurious to the whole country by causing floods. In California and in the interior it simply makes floods and does harm and no good. If it could be kept back sixty to ninety days and spread over the land you would have the most fertile country in the world.

There is no kind of land that can produce equal to irrigated land. You can raise a great number of crops by irrigation. The sediment that comes down with the water fertilizes the land, and you can raise and continue to raise crop after crop. It is, I say, the best land we have in the country, and there is a large extent of it.

The country that is desert, that is, the country that can not raise crops without irrigation, constitutes about two-fifths of the entire area of the United States. I do not wish to mislead by saying that we can irrigate all of this. We can irrigate about 5 per cent. of it as estimated by the chief of this Survey as it now is, without any preparation for storing the water, simply by turning on what water we can get, taking it in the crop season; and by storing it he estimates that we can utilize 14 per cent. of the whole of this land. There are places where you can by storing it utilize 50 per cent., and there are vast regions—sometimes you will find 300,000 or 400,000 acres in a body—that might be irrigated by the available waters if they were saved. If you do not make these reservoirs and commence the system now it will be too late.

It would be interesting if the Senate could examine the map of India as I had an opportunity to do. I saw a very elaborate survey of India brought here by an engineer named Mr. Breerton, who had been working on it for twenty years. The whole of that vast region was covered with little dots indicating reservoirs supplying one hundred and fifty million to two hundred million of people with water.

About forty years ago, however, England, finding that sometimes in dry years the reservoirs would not be filled, thereby causing drought and famine, undertook to dam and divert the large rivers, and by the expenditure of vast sums of money and magnificent engineering they have removed all danger of famine in India.

We now have this problem to deal with, and what we want to do is to take the preliminary steps and preserve the country so that we may have a proper system of irrigation and not allow the reservoir sites to be monopolized in such a manner as to render it impossible to utilize the waste waters, which now cause floods and benefit nobody.

Besides, we are now coming to a point when the Territories are being settled up and people want to make homes there. A good deal of harm has been already done by speculators by monopolizing the water. They have gone on the streams and made claims in such a manner as to obstruct settlement and the use of the water for irrigation, but in most cases you can still go above and store water to supply large areas. It is important now that this system should be commenced, and if you will give the country the information, if you will show the people the lands that can be reclaimed, show them where homes can be made, they will make the homes.

I am not here asking for an appropriation for the purpose of irrigation. I am simply asking for such surveys as are necessary to enable the people to utilize this vast region. It may be said that we should wait for the Committee on Public Lands to mature a land system. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is unnecessary to wait for any action on the part of the Committee on Public Lands, and in fact this must precede any intelligent action on their part.

We must know before we legislate further how to dispose of these lands. We ought to know what lands we have; we ought to have the reservations for the reservoirs which we know are to be kept for the common good. We ought to have these reservoirs made at once. We ought to have the lines for the ditches and canals located at once, for their localities are determined by nature and not by the Committee on Public Lands.

The places where we are to have reservoirs in these mountains to store water and the lines of ditches to command the country and distribute that water are located by the laws of nature by the formation of the country; and when that is done, when we know where our source of supply is and the extent of that supply, how much land can be irrigated, where ditches have to be constructed in order to reclaim the lands, then we can pass a law for the disposal of the lands intelligently to prevent monopoly and to enable the people to acquire homes, but before you say your land shall be disposed of you must know what kind of land it is.

The desert land upon which no water can be brought, where there is no place for reservoirs, where there is not rainfall sufficient, where you only have a little grass for cattle or for sheep—that kind of land can be disposed of in one way under rules and regulations. In fact, there is a good deal of land in my State and in other places that never ought to be surveyed or sectionized, because it is not worth it. You can make some arrangement by leasing such lands to have them utilized. Every ditch which is diverted makes a new lease of water supply, and cattle can range from it further back into the mountains and deserts than they could from the river or water supply from which the ditch is taken.

In disposing of such land, not capable of irrigation, different rules and regulations will be necessary; but land which can be covered by water and can be reclaimed is the choicest part of the heritage of this country, and should be disposed of with great care, and the legislation should be such as to enable settlers to reclaim it, and also to prevent monopoly.

If you have the information before you, if you have your map of your reservoirs and your ditches, you can say to the people upon what terms they can get upon the land, build their reservoirs, construct their ditches, and reclaim the land. If you will give them this information, population will continue to flow into that country. It is a most desirable country; it is most healthful; it is a vigorous mountain country, abundantly productive, only requiring irrigation.

But if you say that you will wait until a plan has been devised by which to dispose of these lands, when no plan can be devised until you have the information, you will continue to wait, and the places for reservoirs will be picked up, your ditch lines will be obstructed, private rights will have intervened, the land will be taken up by cattlemen and others, and the day when it can be utilized for homes will be postponed indefinitely, until the population gets so vast, so pressing that the necessities of the country will require buying out the places for reservoirs and force a new development.

You should make your surveys in advance and give the people information of what there is. That is all we ask. With that information I promise you that there are people enough in the United States to avail themselves of it to make homes in the most healthful and productive part of the country.

If you can spend $600,000 a year for the purposes of science and the future, I do not object to that. We ought to do all that we can for science, to inform the world of what we have and to understand ourselves what we have in our country; but I say while you do that, and the surveyors are in the field making these topographical surveys, you ought to add a little more, so as to show the line of demarkation between the arable land and the land that can not be cultivated, and mark out the lines for ditches and reservoirs as a part of your topographical survey.

When you are working for science, which I approve, do something for the settlers, do something to prevent these lands being placed in a position where they can not hereafter be irrigated. This is the time. If you will pass this law and show the people of the West the land that can be reclaimed and how it is situated you may then go before the Committee on Public Lands and they can devise some scheme whereby the people can take land without danger of monopoly.

This appropriation is recommended by Major Powell, having these surveys in charge, and also recommended by the Interior Department. There are several communications from the Interior Department, which has considered this subject so far as its officers have been able, and the Secretary adopts the estimate of Major Powell.

There was a joint resolution passed requiring this investigation, which was introduced and reported from the Committee on Public Lands by the Senator fram Colorado [Mr. TELLER], requiring that this kind of investigation be made. As I said before, the statutes require that the Geological Survey shall also classify the land, but do not provide for making locations for these reservoirs and ditches; and in view of this condition of things a resolution was passed by the Senate in the following language:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to report to the Senate what appropriation is necessary to enable the United States Geological Survey to carry into effect the joint resolution "directing the Secretary of the Interior, by means of the Geological Survey, to investigate the practicability of constructing reservoirs for the storage of water in the arid region of the United States, and to report to Congress," approved March 20, 1888, and the several acts of Congress requiring such Geological Survey, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to classify the public lands and furnish a map or maps showing the various divisions of the public domain suitable for agricultural, mineral, and other purposes; and particularly to segregate the lands susceptible of irrigation, where irrigation is required, from other lands, and designating places for reservoirs, canals, and other hydraulic works.

That was the resolution, and in response to it the Secretary of the Interior writes:

In response thereto I transmit herewith a report from the Director of the United States Geological Survey embodying his views as to the method of conducting the required investigation, and recommending that an appropriation of $250,000 be made for the purpose. I have no means to make any estimate other than the considerations presented by the Director. The examinations and study made by him have necessarily caused a delay in making response to the resolution which has been due to no other reason.

Very respectfully,

WM. F. VILAS, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE OF THE SENATE.

Then here is a long letter from Major Powell explaining what is necessary to be done to carry out the design of the resolution in connection with the Geological Survey. Major Powell has also been before the Committee on Appropriations and given his testimony; but independent of testimony and independent of everything else here is a vast region of country requiring irrigation, without which it is useless and with which it will become a most productive part of the United States.

It is liable to be placed in such a position in a few years by monopoly of the sources of the streams so that irrigation will be very much retarded or prevented. It is necessary in order that settlements may go on that the people shall have immediate access to this country; they are there now desiring to make homes, and I say that this appropriation is absolutely necessary, and if we have any regard for the public lands, any regard for the settlers, we must let them know what we have and what we can do with it.

I hope that the amendment will be adopted and become a law, and that it will not be defeated on any technical ground. In fact I do not believe there is any technical ground of objection against it. It has been recommended by a committee. It merely increases the appropriation for a topographical survey, and it is simply to carry out laws that are now in force and for the purpose of inquiring into a subject absolutely necessary if the arid country is to be settled.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order on this amendment that it is new legislation. I do not know that any other point of order will lie against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa interpose the point of order?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; to the legislative part of the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the ground that it proposes general legislation?

Mr. ALLISON. That is the only ground upon which I make the point.

Mr. STEWART. I appeal to the chairman of the committee to withdraw the point. The last clause of the amendment, of course, is the only part to which it can apply, and I appeal to the committee to withdraw that, because this is an emergency. The places for the reservoirs are being taken by private parties, and a person who locates where there ought to be a reservoir knows it very well. If he gets in the high mountains he can see that this is to be a reservoir, and let those who go there hereafter take it subject to that. I hope that the chairman of the committee will withdraw the point.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw it, Mr. President.

Mr. TELLER. Do I understand that the Senator has withdrawn his objection?

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the point of order for the reason that if this amendment is to pass I think it is better with the legislative provision in than with it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Iowa to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I do that because after the examination of these reports and the joint resolution No. 6, which was alluded to by the Senator from Colorado, I think this amendment is in order.

I think it is due, however, to the Senators who are interested in this matter and to the committee that sent this amendment to the Committee on Appropriations that I should state briefly the reasons why the Committee on Appropriations did not adopt it.

The committee summoned Major Powell, the chief of the Geological Survey, before it with a view of ascertaining what he would do with this $250,000 if it were appropriated and how he proposed to execute this great scheme of irrigation. He stated to the committee that the greater portion of this $250,000 would be expended in what he calls a topographical survey of the region; that is to say, if we appropriate now $250,000 for this purpose, 80 per cent. of it will be expended in the survey of the topography of this high mountain region. There is in this bill already a provision appropriating $200,000, in round numbers, or $199,000 for a topographical survey of the United States, every dollar of which is to be expended in the discretion practically of the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the Geological Survey. I am aware that the Director now is expending this money in various portions of the United States in making topographical surveys.

So, if an appropriation was to be made for this purpose, it seemed to the committee that it would be wiser to make it in the course of the ordinary appropriations now embodied in this bill. The Director of the Geological Survey stated to the committee that if this money was appropriated, he would use it in making surveys of the highest mountain regions in our country, which would involve, of course, a topographical survey of the headwaters of the Missouri River, those great rivers which unite and form the Missouri.

The Committee on Appropriations did not believe it wise at this time to enter upon a work of such great magnitude as the location of reservoirs and the dedication of land for the purpose of building canals. This undoubtedly is a great work, and it undoubtedly will sooner or later be executed by the Government of the United States, because no private enterprise can engage in the work of diverting the headwaters of the Missouri or the headwaters of the Colorado, or the headwaters of the Platte, or any of those great interior streams.

But it seemed to me, and it seemed to the committee, that before entering upon this work it would be wise to make a further and more definite examination into the methods and the cost of this work, and in the mean time, while these estimates are being made and whilst proper legislation is being prepared for this purpose, it may be a wise thing to enlarge somewhat the general appropriation for topographical surveys. Therefore the committee did not feel or believe that it was wise now to enter upon this work without legislation looking for the segregation of these lands and the prevention of men following up this geological survey day by day and when a location is found suitable for a reservoir under the general land laws immediately picking it up as a homestead, or under the timber-culture law, or the pre-emption law. When a canal is set apart and located by this geological survey, there may come at once an enterprising American citizen who locates himself in the valley or in the pathway of this canal so that the Government of the United States would be bound sooner or later to pay him a large sum of money for the use of the land which he, under the general land laws, is entitled to take. Legislation is necessary on these points.

Therefore the Committee on Appropriations thought as preliminary to this great work it would be wise for the Committee on Public Lands, or some other committee of this body to examine with care the questions involved in it, and make such preliminary legislation as would justify and authorize the beginning of this great expenditure.

For these reasons the Committee on Appropriations did not see its way clear to recommend an appropriation of $250,000 for this specific work, and in this way to commit the Government, without the necessary knowledge as to the expenditure in the future, to a great scheme of irrigating the entire mountain region of our country.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the proposition to appropriate $250,000 for information can not be said to commit the Government to anything. When we have appropriated $250,000 and obtained the information, if we get the information we desire, it may be found desirable for the Government to take some steps to enhance the value of this land by building reservoirs and selling the land at an enhanced price. It may be that the Government will decline to do that. The whole matter is simply one for information, and it in no way commits the Government to any system, to any scheme, to any project whatever, and I am astonished that the committee can find no better objection to the amendment than that.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Major Powell, Director of the Geological Survey, stated that to locate the reservoirs and canals would cost from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000. Therefore it is not an appropriation of $250,000; it is the beginning of a much larger appropriation, which is involved, of course, in this appropriation of $250,000, and certainly if the Government of the United States shall enter upon the construction of these canals and the building of these reservoirs a much larger sum will be involved.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator is entirely mistaken as to what the Director of the Geological Survey said. He said he had already expended a million dollars for the topographical surveys of the United States, and that to complete the entire topographical survey of the United States would cost $4,000,000 more, and would take thirty years time in the way in which we were doing it. I hold the printed statement in my hand and can not be mistaken.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have the Senator read it.

Mr. TELLER. I will do so.

Mr. ALLISON. He said it would cost $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 to make the topographical survey of this region.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no, he said nothing of the kind; and if he had said so it would not make a particle of difference.

The chairman asked:

Q. Are you through with your general statement?
A. Yes, sir; but I want to speak something about the cost.
Q. That is what we want to hear you upon.
A. To complete the survey as we have been going on—

He had been speaking of the topographical survey—without laying out the reservoirs, without laying out the sites for headworks and canals and so on, would take about $5,000,000. We have expended about $1,000,000, so that it would now take about $4,000,000 to complete that work.

He is speaking of the general topographical work of the United States which must ultimately be done. He says that the way they have been going on it would take thirty years. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] asked him:

Q. And what length of time?—A. At the rate we have been going on it would take between thirty and forty years.
Q. With ample means how long would it take?—A. It could be done in ten years.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will yield I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. When the Director of the Geological Survey spoke of $5,000,000 or $4,000,000, he had reference to the topographical survey of the mountain regions. It is certainly well known to those who have examined the subject that the completion of the topographical survey of the United States will cost $20,000,000, and I believe it will cost $30,000,000 before it is completed. He had reference to the topographical survey of the region to be involved in this improvement. The Senator knows very well that the entire region of Colorado has already had its topographical survey.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no, not by any means; a good portion of it, some of it has.

Mr. ALLISON. A good portion of it has, and nominally nearly the whole of it. Of course I do not say that it has had such a close and definite survey as Major Powell is making, nor was the survey of Clarence King of that character; but there has been, as the Senator well says, a million dollars expended in topography in the mountain regions, and $4,000,000 more will be required. That is all there is of the statement of Major Powell.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator is entirely mistaken. He confounds the geological work with the topographical work. They are two distinct things. The vast amount of money which has been appropriated has been appropriated, not for the topographical but for the geological examination of the country, which is an entirely distinct thing. The one is an investigation into the earth and the other is an investigation on top of the earth.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that every scientific man who has made a geographical survey has made a topographical survey accompanying it.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLISON. Major Powell in all his statements everywhere shows that where he is making a geological survey he accompanies it with a topographical survey. It is an essential as a preliminary part of the geological survey. So I confound nothing when I say that.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Iowa is very well posted, I admit, on all these questions; but on some of these points he is evidently a little mistaken. Now, I will go on with the statement of the Director of the Geological Survey, who ought to know something about this matter, if he does not.

Mr. ALLISON. He knows all about it.

Mr. TELLER. I read from Major Powell's statement before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEWART. Is it necessary to wait until you work up all the geological data in order to make the preliminary survey with a view to reservoirs?
Mr. POWELL. No, sir.
Mr. STEWART. That only refers to the local topography?
Mr. POWELL. To the construction of the maps.
The CHAIRMAN. Major Powell is speaking only of the topographical survey.
Mr. STEWART. No, of the geological.
Mr. POWELL. Not of the geological, but the topographical, survey which we are conducting over the country.
Mr. STEWART. Can you not vary your survey so that these reservoirs can be located more rapidly than that?
Mr. POWELL. We can with the necessary appropriations. We could do it in six years if sufficient appropriations were made.
Mr. STEWART. You could locate the reservoirs in five or six years?
Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir; we could make the maps, outline the catchment basins, and lay out upon the ground the headworks, the canals, and the reservoirs in six years, with sufficient appropriations.
Mr. STEWART. Do you not regard that as the most urgent work?
Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir.
Mr. STEWART. Because then settlement can take place, and the geological part of the work could go on afterwards just as well.
Mr. POWELL. Oh, yes. We are pushing the topography very far ahead of the geology all the time.
Mr. STEWART. Then, if you had the requisite appropriations you could locate the reservoirs and make the surveys for settlement in five or six years?
Mr. POWELL. Yes; but it would take about $5,125,000 to do it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. At the rate of about $1,000,000 a year?
A. That is my estimate.
Q. That would complete the topography?
A. It would complete the topography. I have made a second estimate. I have been working the last three days on it.
Q. It would complete the surveys of the basins and districts?
A. Yes, the catchments.
Q. And locate reservoirs, canals, and so on?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. In other words, the additional cost of this contemplated survey would be about $1,250,000 over and above what you are now doing in the way of topography?
A. Precisely.

At the most it can only be a million and a quarter dollars, according to the statement, and according to the admission of the chairman of the committee. I skip some:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Of course, topography is the first thing?
A. Topography is the first thing.
Q. It is the essential thing?
A. And the chief cost.
Q. If you run this whole area into a six years' term you must spend your $4,000,000 for topography, and then the remainder of the work can be done for a million and a quarter?
A. It could be done for a million and a quarter according to my estimate, and could be done pari passu with the other work.

By Mr. HALE:

Q. In round numbers it would cost about a million dollars a year?
A. About a million a year; but we could not use a million this year, because the engineers are not trained yet; they would have to grow.

At the utmost the estimate made by the Director of the Geological Survey is that to make a complete examination of all these natural reservoirs, and not only to do that, but to make the estimates and surveys of the canals, the location of headworks and all that, would not exceed a million and a quarter dollars.

It is possible that that is more than the Government of the United States can undertake to spend to irrigate four-tenths of its area. I do not believe it. What are we to do with the great population that is crowding upon us at the rate of ten or fifteen millions every decade, and the ratio of which is to rapidly increase with the increased number of population? It was estimated in the House of Representatives the other day that the next census would show a population of 64,000,000 people in this country. That was the estimate made by the chairman of the Select Committee on the Eleventh Census, of the House of Representatives. If the population will be 64,000,000 in 1890, what will it be in 1900? What will it be in the next decade thereafter, and the next after that?

The public lands that are capable of cultivation without irrigation are practically exhausted. Of course there are very many millions of acres of them, but they are the interior lands of the continent that are now left, while the land which has been irrigated and which can be irrigated is the pick of the world.

It is not necessary that the United States should go to the expense of building these dams, but they must be put upon the land of the United States. Much of the land that would be covered with water is away above any possibility of its ever being occupied by men for homes. Many of these dams would occupy an elevation of 8,000, 10,000, or 12,000 feet above the sea in regions valuable for nothing else but for storage purposes. Every stream that runs into the great rivers that come down into the Missouri, from the head of the Missouri River clear to the Rio Grande, is full of these basins made by the Almighty, which can be utilized by men for the purpose of peopling those great plains with a population that the Missouri Valley and the Mississippi Valley can not sustain.

I will not hold the Senate here to-day to talk about the advantages of irrigation; but every man who has given the subject thought and attention knows that the great and dense populations of the world have been supported from the beginning of the history of men in regions where they have utilized the soil by means of irrigation. Small farms will be the result in the region where they irrigate, not large farms, and it will make homes for the people where they can not live without irrigation.

As I said, these streams have natural reservoirs, and if the Government will go to work and determine where the reservoirs are, their capacity, the expense of filling them with water, then under some general system of legislation the people of the States, the States themselves, the people who want to put their capital in enterprises, will utilize those basins to a large extent.

But the time will come when the Government of the United States will have to do what every other government in the world has done in the arid regions—put out its money to build reservoirs. If any man will examine and consider the vast amount of capital that went into reservoirs in India in its prime, before it was cursed by British misrule, he will be astounded when he reads of dams 60 miles long for no other purpose than to catch the rain that fell upon the plains lying above them. To-day the British Government is spending millions of pounds in restoring the old reservoirs and old canals in India. It is compelled to do it to prevent a recurrence of what took place within twelve years—the starvation of those people to the extent of more than 10,000,000 inhabitants.

The time will come when we shall be crowded with population and when we shall be required to do the same thing. Is it too much to ask now, in the days of our strength, of our richness, that we should at least know where the places are that we can put the water, and that we shall give to the people who may desire to put their money in these enterprises a knowledge of what it will cost them, how much the reservoirs will hold, their capacity, their cost, and their utility? That is all we ask, and I think we are entitled to it, not because it is local, not because the money is to be expended in Colorado, in Nevada, in California, or in Utah, Arizona, or New Mexico, but because it will eventually make homes for the people still living in New England, or the people who shall hereafter be born on the Atlantic coast and in other sections of the country. It is not a local interest; it is a general interest; and $250,000 is nothing at all in comparison with its magnitude and importance.

The other day there was passed through the Senate a bill appropriating twenty-two million and some odd thousand dollars for rivers and harbors. What did the great States lying in the interior of the continent get from that measure? What did the State I in part represent, situated on top of the continent, having its waters running both to the Pacific and to the Atlantic, get? Not a dollar, and it never did get a dollar from such a measure. The Government has done nothing at any time for the people of that section of the country, a section equal in extent to almost the entire inhabited region east of the Mississippi River.

The State that I represent in part has put into circulation more than $200,000,000 of bullion in the last ten years. We have paid our debts, we have erected our public buildings, and constructed our roads, and all those things we have done without any help from the General Government. We are not to be specially benefited by this system any more than the people of Massachusetts or the people of Iowa or the people of Illinois.

I know Senators say that it is entering upon a big undertaking. It is not, Mr. President. It is determining, first, whether we shall enter upon a big undertaking when we have the evidence before us. I have no doubt about our entering upon it in some shape and at some time, but the first thing to obtain is the information; and why should it be withheld? Who has the authority to do this work but the Government? Who else can do it in such a way that it will be valuable to the people of the whole country?

Take the Rio Grande of the West, rising within 12 miles of my home, and running through the States of Colorado, Nevada, Arizona Territory, and California to the Western coast. Whose interest is it that the water should be stored at the head of that stream? It is the interest of every State and Territory lying below. It flows through a valley that I say here without fear of contradiction is as rich as the Nile, and which will contain a population some day of immense numbers; and yet every foot of that land must be irrigated if it is to be made productive.

This measure is not local, it is not the interest of Nevada or Colorado, but it is the interest of the whole nation that the Government should be put in possession of the facts, so that a system of legislation may be devised when we know the facts which shall make these reservoirs valuable to the public, and shall prevent their appropriation by a few capitalists here and there.

Mr. President, the subject is a great one. I hold in my hand a letter which I received yesterday, written from Colorado, speaking of an area with which I am perfectly familiar. The writer says that by flooding 1,885 acres of land there could be 377,000 acres of land irrigated at a foot of water per acre, and when it has been irrigated two years 6 inches will irrigate it; or, in other words, it will double the area. This examination has been made by private capital. This alludes only to four places, but the examination of the thousands of places like unto these can not be made and will not be made by private capital.

I say, Mr. President, that it is a small sum to ask, and it is not entering upon any dangerous experiment, or any scheme, or any job. It is in the interest of the people who expect to make their living out of the soil, and of nobody else.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have no local or personal interest in this amendment, but I earnestly hope it will adopted. It seems to me that the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations ought to be a sufficient reason to the Senate why the amendment should be adopted. He admitted the importance of the scheme, the great interest the people at large had in it, but said it was necessary for us to know more of it, and that it should be considered by the Committee on Public Lands, or by somebody else, so that we could understand better what we propose to undertake. The proposed appropriation of $250,000 is intended to accomplish exactly that purpose.

No great work is undertaken in this country by intelligent men without a preliminary examination for the purpose of ascertaining something about what is proposed to be entered upon. This appropriation proposes that the Geological Survey shall make an examination and furnish to Congress the information necessary to enable them to determine whether this scheme for the irrigation of this large amount of arid land is feasible.

In the published report made by Major Powell some time since the quantity of arid land in the country susceptible of irrigation is estimated at 1,000,000 square miles, a tract of country equal in extent to twenty large States, which is practically useless as conditions exist at the present time. If this land can be reclaimed by any reasonable expense, here is a great purpose, worthy of the best efforts of the United States Government and of the scientific men to take in hand and attempt to accomplish it.

In addition to all this, I feel interest in this scheme for the reason that a very large part of the State in which I live is liable to inundation. For forty years scientific men have been investigating the question as to how the swamps bordering the great rivers are to be reclaimed from annual overflow. A great engineer, Charles Elliott, devoted years of his life to the investigation of this question, between thirty and forty years ago, and wrote a volume which was published by the Smithsonian Institution, endeavoring to demonstrate that the only feasible plan for reclaiming these rivers from overflow would be to preserve their excessive waters in reservoirs near their sources. The plan or scheme has been entertained and considered by scientific men for a long while, and I do not understand how it can be said now that this first step proposed to be taken in that direction is premature.

If there has been a question considered carefully and with all the facilities which have been at the hands of men connected with it, this has been. It has been looked into as carefully as it can be without actual surveys.

The next thing to be done is to have examinations made so that scientific men may say to the committees of Congress exactly what can be done and what cost will be necessary to inclose an area of country which will hold so many cubic feet of water, and the estimated amount of rainfall that will be tributary to each particular reservoir. When those reports are made and those facts are furnished to Congress it will be possible for us to make some definite and general law by which to guide the Government in future. But we must have some facts to begin with. We can not pass a law now to provide for carrying out this scheme, because we have not the facts and data necessary to enable us to know what we are to do.

The chairman of the committee seemed to apprehend that when a survey shall be made under this appropriation speculators and schemers will follow along the survey and locate homesteads or otherwise take up tracts of country which would be selected as places for reservoirs. They are just as competent to go and make those selections to-day without any examination on the part of the Geological Survey as they will be afterwards. What information would be derived by the examiners in the field would not be made public. The ground lies open for the investigation of such persons now as much as it would then.

There is no danger, in my judgment, of any harm coming from this provision, but I should have no objection to having a clause added that all this land shall be reserved and shall not be subject to be taken up by private individuals until after this question has been settled and the location of these works has been fixed by the engineers of the Government.

Any man who has seen the results which have come from irrigation in many of our Western States, any Senator who has visited Southern California or any other part of the great tract of country where irrigation has been adopted, can form some conception of the immense benefits to result to civilized man from an intelligent system of irrigation. What has been done in that respect has gone along in a haphazard manner, and now many localities where irrigation has been adopted are suffering from the fact that there was no scientific plan in the first place adopted by which irrigation could be carried on in a regular and systematic way.

I think the Government of the United States should start in this matter where the beginning should be, and that it should make first an examination before there is any effort made to do any of the work.

I hope that the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I intend every time I get an opportunity to vote for a bill to inaugurate this irrigation experiment (I call it an experiment) out in those arid regions until something is ascertained by scientific examination to prove that it is right or else to prove that it is wrong.

There is a basis of agricultural power in what we call the sage-brush lands lying upon the crest of the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada Mountains that is equal to any area in the world if we can only get water upon it. The water is there, stored in the Rocky Mountains and in the Sierra Nevadas, which, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] very correctly remarked to me a moment ago, are Alps rising upon Alps. The mountains there as they drop towards the foot-hills become low. They rise towards the crest, become very high, and are snow-clad generally throughout the whole of the year. They drop from bench to bench and furnish a supply of water which if it could be utilized upon the plains would restore that country to what I suppose must have been its pristine agricultural power before the Humboldt River and its tributaries disappeared in some great convulsion of nature.

I hold it to be a duty to make all the use we can of the scientific information within our reach to determine whether that country can be reclaimed. If you pass over the Union and Central Pacific railways and look at the little oases that are around at the different stations where men have had the advantage of bringing water upon the land for a distance sometimes of 4, or 5, or 15 miles I think you will realize something about the productive capacity of that country. Such grass and fruits and alfalfa I never saw grow as are reared in those little places which are thus supplied with water.

I believe that that country can be reclaimed, and I think it can be done by the expenditure of a very small amount of money in the beginning by the Government of the United States upon the public domain. After a little while that experiment, which has been carried on in Colorado with considerable success, of storing water in reservoirs and carrying it out over the plains will fall into the hands of private men, and the ownership of these pockets or places in which the water can be dammed up will become private ownership, and they will pass to the situation, as they have done in California, of monopolizing the use of the water and preventing people who go out there to enter the lands with homestead and pre-emption claims from getting the benefit of it.

In the State of California, commencing back thirty years ago, the riparian proprietors passed up into the foot-hills of the mountains and commenced to dam the waters and divert them from their channels and carry them along with proper gradients, until some of the canals in California are now very nearly a hundred miles long, and they carry rivers in their ditches. These are in private ownership. I know that one river, I think it is the Grand River in California, was diverted in that way before California undertook by her local legislation to prevent it, and I think the canal that is led out from it is now about 100 miles long and it supplies one of the most beautiful and interesting countries in all of that wonderful State. It is called the "raisin belt," the belt in which is now being produced an enormous quantity of raisins annually, the best that are ever brought into any market in the world. The Senator from California on my left [Mr. HEARST] knows that I am stating that correctly, and that lands there now are worth $25 an acre. Lands which eight years ago were not worth $1 an acre easily sell for $25 an acre.

Our system of the disposal of the public lands is to encourage actual settlement by homesteaders. And I think that a necessary part of that system in those arid regions, as we call them, is to make some provision of law by which the control of the water shall be held in the hands of the Government and not be allowed to become a private monopoly. This amendment leads to that result. It provides for a preliminary survey of those areas upon which the water may be dammed up and put in reservations, and from there a supply can be obtained, it may be by Governmental expenditure or it may not be. But if you start one of these reservoirs in the Sierra Nevada Mountains or in the Rocky Mountains and get a sufficient supply of water to furnish a considerable area, and sell for 50 cents an acre the land that will be irrigated by that means, you will get more money than you need for all the improvements of that character that you put upon the soil.

There is another thing about this. There are no forests in that country; there are no trees. If that country could be supplied with trees as abundantly as any portion of the region around Washington City, or even much more sparsely supplied than any portion of this country in reach of Washington, the rainfall would come at once and continue forever, as long as the forests last. Palestine and a large portion of Syria was just as fertile a country as Southern Illinois, fertile as any part of the delta of the Mississippi, but has gone into a desert; and why? Merely because it has been stripped of its forests. The rains do not fall, and there is not a supply of water there.

That people have allowed their country to become a desert merely because they have not preserved their forests. Now you start these great fountains of water, these great reservoirs of water, and drain them upon the plains, and encourage the growth of forests, bushes, timber, trees, or whatever it may be in the way of foliage, and it will be but a short time until you see the rain belt, as it is often called, going into that region of country, as has been done even in Kansas. Ten years ago I passed through Western Kansas and it looked like a desolate country. You go through there now and you find, under our timber-culture laws, by the cultivation of crops and the persistence of the people in planting trees, etc., the rain belt is continually moving to Western Kansas, and probably it will not be twenty years from now until Western Kansas and Western Texas will be abundantly supplied with rainfall.

We owe it to the coming generations; we owe it to ourselves as trustees, holding in trust these great land grants for the benefit of the people of this country, that we should make any experiment which appears to be reasonable in order to inaugurate a system which will reverse this condition of affairs and bring this vast body of arid land into cultivation.

It may be said that this is an experiment; that it is a wild idea. Suppose it is; a great many wild ideas have been realized in a most remarkable degree. When I first came to the Senate I recollect I had never seen a telephone, except those the boys used to make by stretching a twine string between boxes across the street and whispering to each other. The Bell telephone was invented. I saw the first experiments made in Washington City with it. What is it now? An indispensable element in commerce, something that the world would not content itself a moment to dispense with.

A very wild idea this may be, but not wilder than that idea that Morse had when he conceived the telegraph and got Congress to assist in building a line between this city and Baltimore. We have the authority of some very able scientific men——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that that be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. We have scientific men who in regard to this matter act upon established facts, not mere guesswork. You can go out there and measure the elevations of these plains and the corresponding elevations of the mountains above them, the water supply coming from the melting of the snow and the springs on the mountain tops, spoken of by the Senator from Colorado. We know that the water can be led down into the reservoirs and can be distributed, and we have seen that the practical effect of the distribution is to produce crops of unexampled excellence. So there is little experiment about it.

What we ought to do now is to have a topographical survey of the most important positions in the arid region of the country with a view to determine what lands ought to be held in reservations. It is not necessary to put it in this bill that these lands shall be held in reservations. The President of the United States has the power, without making any question of his statement of reasons at all, to hold any land in reservation, to keep it from sale. So if we send out this Geological Survey, and they make an examination and they determine the practicability of this irrigating process, then the President of the United States can hold it in reservation, and that answers the purpose we desire. Then you will find immigration going into that country, and perhaps it will not be thirty years from this day until that country is as well populated as Central Kansas or Western Missouri. So I am in favor of this plan, and I hope the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] is of a twofold nature. It proposes that we shall enter into the field of experiment and exploration, such as was so well described by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], such investigation to be to discover whether it is within the range of fair possibility that these great Western deserts so aptly described can be reclaimed, and by the process of irrigation or by that which flows from irrigation, an increase of rainfall, made arable; and as a second proposition, it proposes that all titles to lands hereafter acquired from the United States in that section of the country shall be subject to the right of the United States to build reservoirs and irrigating ditches for the purpose of reclaiming that which is now a desert and can produce nothing.

It may be, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama, that it is within the power of the President of the United States under general law to withdraw these or any lands from market; but certainly there can be no objection, if this experiment is to be entered upon, that there should be a provision in the legislative measure providing positively that the lands shall be withdrawn, thus taking them out of the domain of executive discretion or disposing of them under the general land laws, subject to the right in the United States to build the reservoirs and ditches.

Mr. President, I favor this amendment and will vote for it. I do so, as I believe, because of no selfish or local reason, but for the general good. It is within the recollection of any, even the youngest, member of the Senate when the great State which I have the honor in part to represent was depicted upon the maps of this country as "the Great American Desert." It is not so now. During a residence of twenty years within the borders of the State of Nebraska I have witnessed wonderful changes in its soil and the capabilities of its production. By reason of increased rainfall, or perhaps a better wording would be to say because of a more even distribution of rainfall, I have seen the area of arable land in that State continually westernized, the western limit of its arable land moving steadily westward and the area of its arid soil constantly and very largely decreased.

I remember well when 150 miles west of the Missouri River was considered the western limit of land fit for cultivation. Now, perhaps for the reasons that have been suggested by the Senator from Alabama (although it is not the reason that is so important as the result), the greater part of the rich States of Kansas and Nebraska are subject to cultivation without irrigation. A small portion in the far western part of these States, for successful croppage year after year, would undoubtedly be benefited by irrigation, but irrigation has long ago ceased to be a necessity. It is no local object, therefore, that prompts me to the support of this amendment.

Several times in going over land to California, and in visiting portions of Colorado, Nevada, and other parts of the West, particularly the Territories, I have seen the lands that it is proposed to benefit and reclaim by the measure about to be inaugurated. I remember some years ago, in passing through the State of Nevada, traveling over what is known as the Humboldt Desert. I had never seen a spot so desolate, apparently so useless for all purposes as that great desert called the Humboldt Sink.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you ever see a more fertile spot in the world when it is cultivated by irrigation?

Mr. MANDERSON. No, and I was about to say when interrupted, as the cars carried us through that great plain of alkali and ashes, and we experienced all the discomfort that comes from the slacking of the alkali dust upon our lips, our eyes were suddenly gladdened by fields of waving grain, showing as high a condition of cultivation as I have ever seen anywhere; grass was abundant and thick, and there were exhibited to us vegetables grown in these ash-heaps that challenged our admiration and were beyond description. All this result was simply for the reason that this land thus improved was "under-ditch," to use the parlance of the country, and that water had been conducted from the mountain sides to the barren alkali land, and made it blossom like the rose.

The old familiar story was told of the saying of a former member of this body, Senator Wade, of Ohio, who in passing over that part of the West, the State of my friend, who so strongly favors this amendment, said that Nevada resembled very much another place not to be mentioned to ears polite, in that all it needed to be made a paradise was water and good society. There is much of truth in the statement that at first seems somewhat shocking. Good society has undoubtedly come to that country, and I hope water will come in all sufficient abundance by reason of this and similar legislation.

Unquestionably, as a measure of economy, it is desirable that the Government should enter upon this course of experiment.

I do not know, Mr. President, that this is the best way to reach the result desired. I do not know that the Geological Survey Office is the best office or the Director of the Geoloical Survey the best man to accomplish this important work. For myself I should be glad to see matters of this kind pass in large degree under the control of those intelligent and painstaking gentlemen, educated at the public expense, constituting the Engineer Corps of the Army of the United States.

I say this without any desire to reflect upon the Director of the Geological Survey, for whom I entertain the highest respect, or upon his Department, which has accomplished great good; but the question who shall do this work is a matter for the future rather than for the present. The desirable thing now is that we should enter upon this course of experiment right speedily for the abundant reasons set forth by the different Senators who have spoken, particularly those from the State of Colorado, who are peculiarly well fitted to give us information on this important subject.

Mr. President, there are other reasons that prompt me to support this measure. There is no difficulty in ascertaining what are the rights of private owners of land along streams, whether they be navigable or not. The law-books are full of decisions settling the rights of riparian owners. If I am a private-land owner and through my lands there courses a stream it is not within the power of my neighbor who lives up stream to divert that water course to his private purposes and from me to my injury, and remedy would lie in law for such diversion.

But when you come to the diversion of streams from their natural course or from their general purposes by whole communities, by the inhabitants of great States, I submit there comes a new and very startling proposition for the courts to determine. I am led to this suggestion for this reason: There flows through the State of Nebraska from its western to its eastern boundary, running a length through the State of very nearly 500 miles, the Platte River. It is not a navigable stream at any point from its mouth to its source, although a wide and rapid river.

It is useful, however, for many purposes, not only for irrigation, but because of its length and width, spreading as it does over much territory, undoubtedly contributes in more or less degree to that increase of rainfall to which I have referred. Within a year or two, owing to the large settlement of agriculturists in the State of Colorado and the use by those cultivating the soil and by the ranchmen of that State of the waters of the north and south forks of the Platte River, there come times at seasons of the year when water should be abundant, and when the water of the Platte River is of the utmost importance to the residents of the State in which I live, that the bed of the Platte River along the lower levels almost needs irrigation to be worthy the name of river. The abundant use of the water from its tributaries by those who tap them for irrigating purposes threatens to destroy the Platte for the uses of Nebraskans.

This evil became so great within the last year that the governor of Nebraska, once a member of this body, Hon. John M. Thayer, addressed a communication to the governor of Colorado, calling his attention to this overuse of the waters of the two forks of the Platte River that caused it to become a dry stream, if that term can be understood, throughout much of the State of Nebraska, but the governor of Colorado very properly said that he did not see what there was within his power to do, and I do not apprehend that a suit could be maintained by the State of Nebraska against the State of Colorado for such diversion and such use of the waters of that great stream. It may be that, if Colorado through its State authorities was to take such action with the water a suit might lie; but I do not see how the evil can be remedied, when many thousands of citizens of the State of Colorado are making the use I have mentioned of the water near the sources of the river.

So nothing could be done apparently by the courts or the States for the purpose of remedying this difficulty. I submit, however, that one of the ways, perhaps the only way, by which the difficulty may be remedied, is that the Government of the United States should take hold of this matter, and prevent the improper or improvident use of the waters of these great rivers by those who live near their sources. By the building of reservoirs such as are contemplated by this amendment, it would be within the authority and power of the officers of the Government charged with that duty to see to it that there was maintained in these reservoirs a proper supply of water during the time when water was needed, either for purposes of navigation or for purposes of irrigation on the lower portion of the rivers. They could be filled when water was abundant, and in the dry season the rivers could remain untouched.

I received in the earlier part of the spring, in May, 1888, a letter from the governor of Nebraska, which is addressed to the Nebraska delegation in Congress, which I will read, because it suggests in somewhat different language that which I have already said, and presents the matter quite forcibly:

STATE OF NEBRASKA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Lincoln, May 7, 1888.

DEAR SIRS: I submit for your consideration a subject of large interest to the people of Nebraska, especially those of the western portion of it. I refer to the use of the waters of the Platte River. Complaints have frequently been made to me by farmers in our western counties that the waters of the North and South Platte during the drier seasons of the year are almost wholly absorbed by the ranchmen occupying the valleys of these streams—especially the latter—who have established a system of reservoir dams and irrigating ditches by which they seem to have acquired control of those streams.

It would hardly be a tenable position for them to assume that the Platte River was created for their especial use and benefit, but it is reasonable to believe that nature intended to bestow her bounties upon all alike, and the assumption is well founded also that the people of Nebraska possess as much moral right to the waters of the rivers in question as the people of Colorado, though the latter have the advantage of us in location. They have the physical power to take those waters, and it is freely conceded that there is not at present any legal means by which their power can be restrained.

I do not desire to deprive the ranchmen and farmers of Colorado of the use of those waters, but I do claim a fair share of them for the ranchmen and farmers of Nebraska. They are abundant enough for all those who dwell in the valleys of the North and South Platte from their headwaters, and of the main Platte to its mouth.

I believe the same facts exist and the same reasoning is applicable in regard to the Arkansas River in Kansas. It is true that does not interest our people personally, but enlightened and unselfish views should prevail, having reference to all sections equally interested.

Having given to this subject much careful consideration and earnest thought, I am led to believe that a feasible plan can be devised by which the end herein outlined can be accomplished.

If Congress can expend millions for constructing reservoirs in the Upper Mississippi to benefit the millers of Minnesota, why may not Congress expend a much less sum upon the two Plattes and the Arkansas for the benefit of the farmers of Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, and Wyoming?

My plan would be for Congress to make an appropriation for the survey of the headwaters of the two Plattes and the Arkansas in Colorado, with the view to the building of reservoirs there to hold back the surplus waters from the spring rains and melting snows of the mountains and cañons.

A system of this kind, it appears to me, is practicable, and under proper restrictions and control the waters of those rivers can be utilized for the great advantage of all the people directly interested, as well in Nebraska and Kansas as in Colorado and Wyoming.

If a measure of this character were adopted and carried into execution a vast domain of public lands, now regarded as almost worthless, would be opened for settlement and made susceptible of a high degree of cultivation. The area of the public lands now open for settlement, and which attract the settler, is rapidly diminishing. As a result of the measure herein advocated, new fields will be opened for those seeking homes in the West where an immense population may be sustained, and will to a considerable extent meet the demand created by the exhaustion of the supply of public lands now offered to the settler.

It is difficult to conceive any good reason why Congress should not provide for carrying this measure into effect, as well as to provide for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Furthermore, here is a field where a small portion of the surplus, now locked up in the Treasury, can be utilized for the public good and add largely to the wealth of the nation, for it does not require any great degree of foresight to be convinced that the outlay for this enterprise will be returned to the Government with manifold increase. This subject will challenge attention in the future, if not now, and will have to be met.

The present session of Congress being far advanced, the circumstances may not be auspicious for early action, but it is desirable that this matter should receive attention, and I therefore present it for your consideration.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN M. THAYER.

Senators C. F. MANDERSON and A. S. PADDOCK and Representatives JAMES LAIRD, G. W. E. DORSEY, and JOHN A. MCSHANE,
Washington, D. C.

P. S.—Since writing the above Congressional reports allude to an amendment to some bill offered by Senator PADDOCK, relating to irrigation, but not having seen the bill I do not know its scope and character.

J. M. T.

It was probably because of this letter and because as a member of the Committee on Public Lands his attention had been challenged to matters of this character that my colleague [Mr. PADDOCK], who is unfortunately absent, presented, I think by way of amendment to this bill, or if not by a bill that went to the Committee on Public Lands, substantially the measure that is presented by the Senator from Colorado.

It is suggested to me, and I remember now that the resolution introduced by him went to the committee of which he is chairman, the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River, and was by him reported favorably from that committee and sent to the Committee on Appropriations. I regret very much that he is not here so that he could himself urge the adoption of this amendment, having given this matter the attention that its importance and the feasibility of the plan that is suggested by the amendment demands.

It has been suggested, Mr. President, that very great changes have been made by reason of the denuding of our forests and other causes on the one hand, producing arid soil and desert land, and on the other, by reason of the cultivation of the soil, producing that which is arable and fertile. I think those who have gone over our Western country and are familiar with its characteristics see there evidences of these changes.

A year or two ago it was my fortune to travel over New Mexico and Arizona, and my attention was called by a geologist, who was of the party, to what he claimed to be evidences of the fact that at some far-off period there were, in that country, irrigating ditches in great number. I think there can be no question but that that land, now in great part an arid desert, not fitted for the purposes of cultivation, hardly fitted in many parts for grazing, was at one time a fertile and a promising country.

It is not easy to conceive that those venturesome and intelligent Spaniards who with Cortez conquered Mexico and who followod Coronado in his wonderful expedition centuries ago in search of the famous seven cities of Cibola were tempted to march, as they did, to the far-off Arkansas and probably to the still farther Platte River, if the country through which they journeyed was at that time what it is to-day.

I have no question of the fact that great parts of New Mexico and Arizona were in that distant time countries of great fertility, maintaining a great and prosperous agricultural population, with a fairly advanced civilization, of which there are many evidences. I believe it is possible to reclaim these now waste places, and certainly under our civilization, so much greater than that of the past, we can bring these arid plains of the West again to be fertile farms, affording prosperous homes to a progressive people.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I have not been able to give my assent to this proposition, nor have I been convinced by the argument that has been made here, substantially all of which is trash. No one doubts that if water is placed upon grounds of the highest altitude, vegetation follows, and, of course, the traveler across the western wastes who has encountered one of these oases always remembers it, and he is to be pardoned for bringing it to mind on a proper occasion. But the question is a practical one in a different respect.

We have got a large area of public domain beyond the reach of present occupation, and that is the area which it is sought by this measure to begin to bring within the reach of cultivation. I am not one of those who think that a measure of that kind is of present importance, because I do not believe that it is the public interest to absorb all the public domain at the earliest possible day.

There are millions of acres of land in Kansas, in Nebraska, in Minnesota—why need I specify the States?—not 10 per cent. of the arable surface of the United States to-day is under cultivation. Why should men be enticed away from the places where they now live, where agriculture is as profitable as anywhere, from lands that are cheap enough to answer all the purposes of even the poorest, to go into spaces where the very meagerness of the population makes expensive everything they do far beyond what it would if they were working in some locality where they were surrounded by neighbors, by the appliances of civilization, by the means and facilities of transportation, of schools, of churches, and so on, which they would not need themselves to provide out of their meager means.

Why, Mr. President, should we not keep some portions of the national domain for the generations yet to come? I have at times been in love with the philosophy of Artemus Ward, who said as posterity had not done anything for him, he did not see why he should do anything for posterity.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks me would not as many inhabit it now as in the future, if some of them had it now? I say no. It is not the land. The land of course is not going to be absorbed, but it is the ownership of the land that I am speaking of. There is just as much land in the country, I suppose, as there was a thousand years ago, and no less, but the ownership of it is the material thing. The moment the United States Government ceases to be a great land-owner that moment land in private possession commences to go up. It is possible now to get cheap land in almost all the States, that is to say, comparatively cheap; but it is because the United States has a great area which it is constantly offering for nothing to homesteaders and pre-emptors that the price of land is kept down in the older States and within the reach of men of modest means. The moment the Government has disposed of its domain land will go up with fearful rapidity, and the men of the present and the men of the immediate future in large numbers, in countless thousands, will find themselves unable to get land.

I am not anxious to absorb this public domain; I am not anxious to live to see the day when the congestion of population around the great cities that produces disturbance can not be relieved by the going out of the population thus congested upon the public domain, where it can find, if not what it would like to have, something, at least, that will be conducive to independence and bring an ample support.

That is one reason why I am not willing now to do anything which will induce the population within the present areas to go out into these great altitudes upon the roseate anticipations which will be excited by the reports we shall get. There is no doubt about the fruitfulness of that soil; there is no doubt that, supplied with water, it will yield bountifully. That we all know; and even if we had the report, certainly we should not learn anything of that kind that we do not know now of the result of this experiment. I know the fertile brain of these gentlemen, and I suppose the Chief of the Geological Survey wants another job. We shall hear all about it on the finest letter-press; there will be the finest pictures the mind of man ever conceived of or the photographer's art ever produced as the result of it; there will be endless volumes and cart-loads of books, I may say, about it, and there will be employment for Congressmen's sons and relatives and friends.

The Geological Survey is the lying-in hospital of the Government. It never yet refused employment to a single relative of a Congressman or to any one who is supposed to be influential in regard to obtaining appropriations, and the appropriations they ask for are never refused, and, with one exception, it is the only appropriation made in the precise terms requested and never diminished in either House of Congress.

I venture to say for whatever it may be worth that the money that has been expended by the Geological Survey, as a rule, has been the worst expenditure since the Government was made. We have heard, of course, a great deal about ethnology, about the disappeared and the disappearing races on the American continent, a large portion of which, in my belief, has been pure invention, just as absolutely the work of the brain of man without the basis of fact as the tales of Munchausen.

When we do this I want it done, in the first place, under proper auspices. The time will probably come when the Government should do it, but it will not come until population presses upon these areas and demands that they be opened in order that the men who can not get land otherwise may there be supplied.

We have 60,000,000 of people in the United States. Make it 64,000,000; make it 100,000,000—still the comparative density of population is nothing. There is room for 400,000,000 people within the limits in which cultivation of the soil is carried on now, and there will be no overcrowding. Why, then, should we not preserve to some extent the existing condition of things? Why should we not rather seek to develop that which is within our own immediate range, and why not leave some of these areas for those who are to come after us and who by changing fortune or by means of successful enterprise or skill and determination, or of that feeling which bids a man to leave the place of his birth, may find comfortable means to go out into these high altitudes, these unexplored solitudes of the Rocky Mountains and of the great plains?

Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska builds his support of this measure upon the belief that there will be more water in the South Platte. Let him put the men of Colorado who are supporting this measure upon the stand and ask them what will be the result of it, and they will tell him that for every drop Nebraska gets now it will not get half a one if this measure shall be carried out to its full fruition. Why, Mr. President, the area of cultivation, of irrigation in Nebraska alone will have no more water than falls upon that great arid watershed. This whole measure is conceived in utter disregard of the rights of the riparian proprietors on the Lower Platte and the Lower Arkansas and the Lower Mississippi. I do not mean to say that they are to be taken into question now. I am not arguing for that.

Mr. STEWART. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator wishes a chance to speak, I will make a motion to adjourn on his account.

Mr. President, the water that is necessary to cultivate all the land that is susceptible of cultivation upon the Upper Platte and the Upper Arkansas will take more than falls or than is carried off on the surface on which it falls in all that great area. The General Government has got no jurisdiction over what the Colorado man should do with the water that is taken out on the part on which he is engaged in enterprises upon his own land, and it can not defend or protect the rights of the riparian proprietor on the Lower Arkansas or the Lower Platte to the flow of the water to which he was accustomed when he bought his land, nor to any other flow. It will have to be settled, like all other questions of that kind which involve the infringement of the rights of one by another, by the courts. The Government storing water in Upper Colorado and feeding it out to the people in the lower valley of the Platte will be a spectacle that the Senator from Nebraska will not live to see; it will not come.

Mr. President, because in the first place I believe in retaining just as much as we can under a judicious system of the public domain for the future, because I am opposed to the expenditure by the present head of the Geological Bureau, because I am opposed to giving him any further privileges with the public Treasury, and because I see in this a means of speculation in the public domain, I am opposed to it.

I am thankful to the Senator who moved this amendment that he put the amount at $250,000. If he had put it at a million probably there would not be two votes against it in this body. We deal with these sums as though they were playthings, and when anybody says anything about appropriating the public money the answer is that a tremendous surplus has been piled in the Treasury which invites all sorts of extravagances and relieves us of all responsibility. I do not say anything, therefore, about the money itself. I know that is vain. But I do speak about it as I think from the higher standpoint of the public weal, of the interests of those who are to come after us, of things which may in themselves concern even the perpetuity of the American Republic; and I say that now is not the time; no need calls for it; every dictate of public policy, I think, is against it; and that, to my mind, is re-enforced because I believe the money will be extravagantly expended—not an argument against spending, but extravagantly spending it.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment, although I have myself interest in this section of the country and feel towards Colorado almost as towards my own State, willing to do anything and everything I can to advance its interests, for a large portion of its population went from Kansas; not a town or a hamlet in that State but probably has more men who once lived in Kansas than almost any other State in the Union. I know them; I see them every year. I have watched the growth of that State. I know that the climatic changes in that State and all that great area which lies between the Rocky Mountains and the Missouri River during the past thirty-two or thirty-three years I have been a witness of it—it has come without anything being done to promote it except the labor of the pioneer. He has done it not always for his own profit; he has done it for the public interests, not so designing, but with that result, more than for his own benefit, and as he has worked his way westward, as he has cultivated the soil, as he has planted the trees, as he has built the domestic fire, as he has stimulated the building of railroads he has compelled climatic changes which have made that which was before uninhabitable not only inhabitable, but fruitful to the last degree.

He has not always lived to get the full benefit of it; he has done it for those who are to come after him, but he has done it; and that same process still continuing with the necessary and inevitable growth of the population westward, whether with or without inducement, will bring a similar change still further west. It has been left for the western pioneer to demonstrate the practical truth of the assertion of the good book, that the earth was made for man. Wherever there is soil good for anything, where human labor is brought to bear upon it, it can be made to yield. He has been the compelling agent which has brought about the final result.

Yet, Mr. President, twenty-five years ago when the pioneers first entered upon these great spaces, if the Government had then said "We want to know what is in the mountains, and we want some gauge of the great resources of the United States," it could have done something of this kind with a great deal better grace than it can do it now. Now, the men in Colorado have been going into every place where the water naturally flows, they have cut out ditches, as a result of which they have cultivated fields which before could not be tilled. They have made Colorado not only a mineral State but an agricultural State, and at this late day the Government comes in, and under the pretense of doing that which they have already done really, perhaps as a subject of speculation, as it will practically be, to spend money to publish abroad what the pioneer himself has done with his own labor and without help from the Government.

Mr. STEWART. Nothing has surprised me more than the reasons given by the Senator from Kansas against the adoption of this amendment, and I want to call attention to some of those unique, peculiar, and original objections. One of them was that it would deprive Kansas and the Lower Mississippi of water, and would therefore be in violation of the principle of riparian proprietorship. Now, it is well known that this water is only collected in flood times, that at other times these streams run dry, and I should like to have somebody figure out how the Lower Mississippi or Kansas could possibly be injured by relieving it of the surplus water.

This water that we would save runs to waste into the ocean. There is no human being that has got any beneficial interest in it. There is plenty of water in the ocean for the fish within it, so that no fish, no animal, nobody will be benefited by this water flowing to the ocean.

So far as that argument is concerned that taking some of the surplus of the water of the Platte River in time of flood and saving the Lower Mississippi and the lower valleys of the Platte from injury is a reason why this amendment should not pass, it is in keeping with every other reason and with all the reasons assigned by the Senator from Kansas.

Another reason was that he wanted to preserve the population for Kansas and did not want the population to go out into new Territories. I think that Kansas is pretty well settled. I do not believe that there are 5,000,000 acres of land in that State that have not been entered upon. All the best land has been filed upon in Kansas and the people are going west of Kansas.

Then, again, there is another reason. He says he wants to save these lands for posterity. He wants to save these mountainous Territories for posterity. How is he saving them for posterity? By what process? He says that this amendment squanders them, and he wants to save them. What is this amendment? This amendment does not dispose of an acre of land. On the contrary, it is an amendment to prevent the headwaters of these streams from being monopolized so that the land will be lost to settlement.

Every year thousands, if not millions, of acres of land are practically destroyed because the headwaters of streams are monopolized, and it becomes impossible to utilize them because there is no place to save the water. This amendment provides for reservations for reservoirs to store water so that it can be distributed on these lands.

I know that there is one class of men who are interested in keeping these rivers open to speculation and keeping these places for reservoirs open to speculation, and that is the cattle barons. They get a location at the head of a stream and command the whole situation. I have been surprised that we have not made these reservations, that we have not a place reserved for reservoirs so that the country can ultimately be settled.

I do not think it is quite generous in the Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, to advocate a proposition that shall exclude settlers from these Territories. If there is a chance to benefit the people by opening to them this section of country, which is better than the plains of Kansas, let them go there. It was supposed the whole country was free to them. There are Territories in the West that were organized as early as the Territory of Kansas; they have been organized for the last forty years, some of them.

People have lived there, made their homes there, and there are millions of people there now, and laws should be passed that will prevent the monopolizing of land and of water and make it possible to develop that region. I say they have just as good rights as any other people in the United States.

The Senator objects to the Geological Bureau and its Director. It is no time now to discuss the organization of that bureau. Its organization is an established fact. Its Director is competent, energetic, and enthusiastic. The bureau has in charge this work, and there is no other means of accomplishing it. No one proposes to abolish the bureau; $600,000 is already appropriated in this bill for the work which is connected with it. The amendment provides for $250,000 more to make the necessary exploration, surveys, and topographical work to secure the reservoirs and ditches, so that we can know what land can be irrigated.

This irrigation survey is but a small part, but it should go along with the other. It is a waste to have two sets of engineers doing this work. It is a part of the work you are appropriating $600,000 for, and it is a part of the work necessary if these lands shall be dedicated to settlers.

I know what the pioneer settlers want on this subject. I know how anxious they are that these rivers shall be preserved to the people, so that they may be spread over the land and make homes for the millions. I know we must take some action in that direction, and I know if it is not taken by some other committee besides the Committee on Public Lands, we may despair of ever having it done.

It is the first time I ever heard it announced by any member of that committee, or any member of Congress in either branch, that it was desirable to discourage settlement on any part of our continent. The people of the West who have gone there and made their homes have made an empire in those mountains that were not very long ago marked on the geography of the country as the unexplored regions of the great desert of America. Those people have built homes and have prosperous Territories there. If a policy is to be pursued by Congress to prevent the settlement of that region, to make it impossible to develop it, it will be a great disappointment to the pioneers and bad faith on the part of the United States, and a reversal of the policy of this Government.

The people feel a deep interest in this question more than in any other. They do not want to rob Kansas of her population, and there is no danger of it. If the lands of Kansas are not already taken up they soon will be.

I tell you this is an anti-monopoly measure. This is a measure to preserve this land for the people. This is a measure to prevent the headwaters of these streams from being monopolized by a few, and every year I see the amount of land that can be irrigated is being diminished by a monopoly of the waters of the great desert country. One half of it is already gone and the other half will go too, and then we shall have to wait through a long series of years and buy out these monopolists in order to get a place to build dams to save the water and irrigate the land.

I am astonished, I say, that there should be such a policy hinted at—that anybody should suggest that relieving these great rivers of their flood waters by dams in the mountains could possibly be injurious to any one, or that anybody should claim here that we should not have proper legislation for the Territories of the West for fear population would go there. I am astonished that anybody should be unwilling that the necessary reservations should be made before they all fall into the hands of monopolists.

This scheme did not originate in the brain of Major Powell; it originated with the Senators from Colorado and myself. I introduced a bill in December last on this subject and had it referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which bill has not been reported, providing for the segregation of the lands that could be irrigated from those which could not be. I then offered a resolution in February last calling the attention of the Secretary of the Interior to this matter, and he sent a long report showing the desirability of doing what was proposed. I then had the honor to put in another resolution, which brought forth the report that has been alluded to here to-day.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] also introduced a bill and had it referred to the Committee on Public Lands, providing for this very investigation, and it was reported favorably and passed and is now a law, and this amendment is simply legislation to carry out the provisions of that law. This scheme originated with men who were familiar with that country and desirous that it should be preserved for the people.

When the question is one of giving away the public lands or to let corporations get more of them, I will go as far as any man to preserve them for the people. This amendment is in that direction and it ought to be a part of this law. There is no other relief available. We see that there can be no hope through the Committee on Public Lands, as their policy is against the development of that region. Their policy, as represented by their chairman, is against the settlers, against the hundreds of thousands of people who have made homes in that country and are now waiting for wholesome laws under which they can develop it.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to say just a word in regard to this. In the first place, Mr. President, I doubt whether the origination of this scheme belongs to the Senator. I will call attention to the testimony of Major Powell, on page 70 of the report of the Committee on Appropriations on this bill, in which he says:

> Twelve years ago I sent a volume of 200 pages as a report to Congress on this subject. What I wish to say further is, that if this irrigation work is to be done a general increase of my appropriations ought to be made. I could expand and get scientific men and experts to do both.

The Senator will have to take hold lower than he did a moment ago if he wants to get the credit of it.

Now, as to who shall get these lands and in support of what I said about the whole theory to put this into the hands of the wealthy people and not the poor settler, this occurred on page 67 of the testimony taken before the Committee on Appropriations:

> By Mr. BECK:
> Q. Suppose some fellow should jump that claim as soon as it was marked out and say, "Here is a good thing; we have got it from the Geological Survey," what is going to prevent a squatter from taking it?
> A. It is our purpose to mark it out so that the people will know what lands can be used for irrigation.
> Q. It is just giving a fellow an intimation of where he can get a big thing?
> A. Certainly; that is the very purpose.
> Q. Then your survey ought to include with it exclusion from private location.
> A. I think not; let me explain that to you.

Then he goes on to explain.

Mr. STEWART. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him if he has read this amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, I have read the amendment; but that will simply be a thing of to-day. The Senator will be here with all his volubility next year to ask that something shall be done next year to make those lands available, and that can only be done by millions of capital. Major Powell says in reply to a question of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] on page 70 of this document:

> You must remember that the utilization of a large stream by the construction of a reservoir is going to take combined capital, amounting to $500,000, $1,000,000, or $5,000,000, as the case may be.

The poor settler who wants a little tract of land that he may cultivate is going to stand a good chance with a combination of that sort! That is all, Mr. President. The thing did originate just exactly as I said it did. It has been pressed for no purpose so far as we know—of course the Senator can state his own position, and I do not quarrel with him about it—but it was originated in the scheming brain of the head of the Geological Survey. He expects some day to be incorporated into the Constitution of the United States as an amendment, and if it was not for the hope that he would expend this money this would not have headway enough to have washed a handful of earth in the Arkansas Valley.

What I said about the water supply in the lower valleys related entirely to what the Senator from Nebraska had said. He said the absorption of the water already in the upper portion of those valleys makes the lower portion dry—dry as a powder-horn—during a large portion of the growing season. To the suggestion he makes that we shall get more water up there by reason of storage and thereby have some chance below, the answer is complete, as any one familiar with the subject well knows, and that is that with all the water that falls still there will not be enough to supply the immense areas adjacent to the sources of the Platte and the Arkansas.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. I will.

Mr. MANDERSON. Is it not a fact that the present system of irrigation by most of the settlers in Colorado and along the headwaters of the springs and courses through Nebraska and Kansas is by adapting the stream above the land that they wish to place under irrigation and running a canal or ditch to their land, not by storing up the water in reservoirs?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly it is. In other words, it takes the current supply.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is, they take direct from the current and not from the reservoir. That is the present system?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. MANDERSON. Would it not be infinitely better for those who live down stream if the Government should take a third of those rivers at flood tide, when there is an abundance of water, and draw them into reservoirs and then in the dry season draw from the reservoirs and let the natural stream pursue its course?

Mr. PLUMB. How would the people living along the bank get the benefit of the reservoir if the water from the reservoir was not put into the main stream?

Mr. MANDERSON. The water would be conducted from the reservoirs by ditches.

Mr. PLUMB. That can not be done. The reservoir must be made between hills. It can only be taken out at one point, and that point must always lead into the main stream. That, of course, is the trend of the depression to the main stream. For instance, the Arkansas runs 280 miles in the State of Colorado. The stream heads about 15 miles above Leadville. At every point where there is valley enough down the Arkansas ditches have already been cut out practically, and, of course, if the supply was greater there would be simply greater ditches and a greater supply, because the valley is already under partial cultivation now. If the cultivation were extended, as it naturally would be, and I have no objection to that, then, of course, more water would still be required, and that would take up more than all the water that ever falls in that country.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator will allow me further, for I think our interests are almost identical, representing States which are so much alike, as it is now the parties living along the upper waters of these rivers, the Arkansas and Platte, exercise their own sweet will. They take without let, hinderance, or regulation direct from the stream.

Mr. PLUMB. Under their rights as riparian proprietors.

Mr. MANDERSON. Exactly. Would it not be better if in the valleys in the mountains where these streams head the Government should make great lakes by way of reservoirs, and supply the waters of the upper country in that way and allow those below to have the natural streams?

Mr. PLUMB. There can be no natural stream without this water. In addition to this the water must come in the natural stream. If it is taken through private agency, some ground subject to great absorption may shortly use the supply, and the areas there are so large that more water would be taken for those people. But I am not opposing it on their account. I am not saying that it is not proper they should come here and ask that it should be done. I did not base any portion of my argument upon the idea that it was to deprive the people of the Lower Arkansas of water. I only said that this amendment was not complete in the particular in which the Senator from Nebraska would have us believe it complete, the effect of it being to appropriate the entire water in such a way that the people of the Lower Platte and the Lower Arkansas would not have any, which is bound to be the result.

Mr. MANDERSON. They are doing it now.

Mr. PLUMB. We now at least fail to give legal sanction to it. I believe that the Lower Arkansas would be taken from the people who live along its banks by the absorption of the water in the upper headwaters of that stream. That is likely to happen. Perhaps it can not be helped, and I am not going to quarrel with the people who are seeking to use it; but what I said was that there is room enough and there is no necessity for appropriating these lands now. There is plenty of land in Nebraska. Why invite the people of Nebraska to go out there? Why invite the people of Kansas to go out there? If they go upon the conditions now existing, by such inducements as are now held out to them, as people have done heretofore, to found homes there and build up a prosperous commonwealth there, it is all right. But it is one thing to let them go in that way, helping themselves and at the same time helping the public and contributing to the public interest, and another thing at this time by a process which absorbs the public domain too rapidly and unnecessarily, to cut off that supply of population not only in the great future, but for the immediate future, which, as I think, is fraught with the greatest possible consequences to the people of this country.

Mr. MANDERSON. I submit an amendment to the pending bill and move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report favorably an amendment submitted on the 28th instant by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], intended to be proposed to the pending bill. I move that it be referred, without printing, to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I am not about to make a speech on this subject. I have no opinion to give as to the propriety or impropriety of attaching the amendment to the pending bill, though I do not see why it might not be done. As a rule, however, perhaps the wisest and safest course is to sustain our committees on questions of this kind.

However that may be, the right side of this question is advocated by those interested in those distant plains. I have been on them to a limited extent. In the future, and not in the very far future, there will be a development of wealth on them which bewilders the imagination now in trying to conceive of it. This process of irrigation will be adopted. It may be delayed, but it at last will come.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] says the superintendent of the Geological Survey almost expects to be incorporated into the Constitution as a part thereof. If he were, there would be an acquisition of wisdom and usefulness to that instrument, and the general-welfare clause of the Constitution would be greatly enlarged, in my judgment. I look upon Major Powell as one of the most useful and scientific men of his age, and he will be remembered by his glorious works long after the rest of us are forgotten.

I did not rise, however, for the purpose of speaking, myself, on these points. I had furnished to me, without any request of mine, some days ago a memorandum which I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to have read at the Secretary's desk. I do it as my contribution, although at second hand, to the knowledge which this debate will disseminate throughout the public mind, so that hereafter when the subject comes up again it may be referred to as a statement of important facts. It comes to me from a source of the highest credit and reliability, and as the result of very extensive research and scientific knowledge.

I understand that the proposition before the Senate is merely for the appropriation of money to investigate and survey the vast expanse of arid country with a view to its future development and usefulness. With the consent of the Senate, I ask that the memorandum that I send to the Secretary's desk may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IRRIGATION IN THE UNITED STATES.

For more than a generation, indeed before exploration had thoroughly revealed the condition of the midcontinental plains, the possibility of supplying them with moisture and of reclaiming them to culture has been much considered. Repeatedly the attention of Congress had been called to the expediency of taking action looking to such a result, and ten years ago Maj. J. W. Powell, then in charge of the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region, submitted to Congress an elaborate report on the whole arid region, accompanied with maps, suggestions, and recommendations as to a comprehensive policy of reclamation.

On the 13th of February last the Senate passed a resolution inquiring of the Secretary of the Interior whether it was desirable to authorize the Geological Survey to segregate those portions of the public domain capable of irrigation from other portions, and to select and reserve places for reservoirs, rights of way for ditches, etc. Subsequently a joint resolution was passed by both Houses and approved by the President directing the Interior Department, through the Director of the Geological Survey, to make the examination contemplated, as to the practicability of reservoirs, the capacity of streams, and all facts bearing on the questions of the storage and distribution of water throughout the infertile region.

This expressed desire to survey the region referred to does not necessarily imply a purpose to build reservoirs and establish a gigantic system of irrigation at the expense of the Government. The present plan is only to obtain information—information which in the nature of things can be acquired only by the Government—in order that corporations or co-operative owners of the arid land may hereafter organize means for its fertilization.

To be done economically and thoroughly the survey for irrigation ought to have been begun by the Government ten or fifteen years ago, before settlers had, by petty methods for utilizing the sources of supply, interfered with the establishment of a comprehensive system.

About one-third of the entire soil of the United States requires irrigation in order to be productive, estimated at 1,300,000 square miles.

This lies almost entirely within the Territories and west of the one hundredth meridian, which cuts in two Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Texas, and is exactly half way between the seventy-fifth meridian, which emerges from the Atlantic and runs north and south through New Jersey, and the one hundred and twenty-fifth meridian, which skirts the Pacific coast at Portland, Oregon.

East of the one hundredth meridian some lands could be advantageously irrigated, and west of it there are table-lands to which water could not be carried, and broad belts, as in Oregon and Washington, so situated that irrigation is not required.

Of the 1,300,000 square miles unproductive without being artificially watered it is estimated that there are 300,000 square miles that are either mountain ranges, high levels not conveniently accessible, or drainless salt deserts, or mineral or timber lands where irrigation is not desirable, leaving 1,000,000 square miles, now virtually arid, which Major Powell estimates could be made productive if furnished with water.

This 1,000,000 square miles forms a vast empire. Out of this domain, if it could be reclaimed, could be carved thirty States of the size of Indiana; all of our States east of the Mississippi could be outlined upon its surface, and there would be enough land around the margin for twenty States like Massachusetts.

To the question, How best to make an effective preliminary survey? Major Powell has addressed himself, and has furnished to Congress an approximate estimate of method and cost.

Irrigation seems to have been one of the earliest auxiliaries to agriculture, and ever since the beginning of history countless millions of human beings have been enabled to survive on the earth by availing themselves of its benefits. Its experimental period long since passed, and it is now practicable to make a pretty close estimate of its adaptability to any given arid region.

One point which the Department is inclined to emphasize is the necessity of making the preliminary survey at once. The delay which has already taken place in beginning the work has cost the Government much money by permitting obstacles to a complete irrigation to multiply. It is not claimed to be essential that the plans for irrigation should be executed at once; but it is believed to be indispensable that the Government should immediately lay out the great work for the future—should make the needful surveys, ascertain what lands are infertile, and what water is available, and take possession of salient points of river and wild land before their further appropriation by settlers shall interfere with the enforcement of a comprehensive scheme for the general benefit. Every day that an appropriation for this survey is withheld the acquirement of vested rights goes rapidly on under conditions that will seriously hinder the Government in establishing a general system.

This is a case where delay is dangerous. The agriculture of the arid region, under the pressure of tremendous immigration, is developing, and its unregulated development involves the resort to transient expedients, at once costly and wasteful. The pioneer on the alkaline plains finds himself engaged in a desperate struggle for life, and he seizes the nearest streams that will fertilize his farm without due regard to the losses or gains of the pioneers who are coming later to settle the adjacent sections. Totally unrestrained by any interests but his own, he turns aside and exhausts the affluents that are most convenient to him, and which, properly economized, would be ample for a hundred times the service. Thus vested rights are constantly acquired which obstruct subsequent regulation and limitation by law.

As to the prospective value of this million square miles that might, through artificial watering, be secured to tillage, it is incalculable. It is not now generally salable at the Government price of $1.25 an acre, but when irrigated it would be worth at least $30 an acre, a total of $19,200,000,000, a sum three times as great as the cash value of all the farms in the United States in 1860.

For the irrigation of this area we have the annual precipitation upon 1,300,000 square miles of mountain, valley, and plain. This ranges from 5 inches or less on the driest plains to 30 inches on the mountains, and even 75 or 100 inches on the highest peaks, and the average for the whole region is not far from 15 inches. If all this could be applied to the land suited by configuration for cultivation it would afford about 20 inches of water annually for the whole area, or nearly double the amount which need be applied to crops during the growing season. The water which falls in the arid region would therefore fully meet the agricultural needs if only it could be stored until the proper season and then conveyed to the proper land.

But many causes unite in cutting down the amount of land that is profitably irrigable. There are three great classes of land in the arid region—the irrigable lowlands, the plateau forests on the elevations, and the pasturage lands between. It is not considered likely that more than 20 per cent. of the entire arid area will ever be reclaimed by the most elaborate irrigation. Placing it at 15 per cent., or 150,000 square miles, it still promises an area one-half as great as all the land now cultivated in the United States. At $30 an acre this would add $2,880,000,000 to the nation's wealth.

The general survey of all these lands is being proceeded with by the Department, but the estimate of irrigable possibilities requires special local surveys. Some streams furnish more water than can be used, and others far less than is needed, and the comparative eligibility of different streams depends on many considerations and on relations difficult to ascertain.

To determine the maximum of farming lands in a given district, the selection of sites for reservoirs, and a system of headworks and canals, it is necessary to ascertain—

1. The configuration of the ground by accurate topographic maps.
2. The determination and distribution of water from each catchment basin.
3. The adaptability of soils for irrigation.

Reports must be had on the rate of evaporation from different reservoirs, the rate of seepage from different soils, the adaptability of different soils to convey water, the need of different localities, the disposition of washed-out salts, the cost and maintenance of reservoirs, the effects of frost, the existence and extinguishment of vested rights, and the measurement of available water. A study must be made proportioned to the magnitude of the work.

From the experience of farmers in Utah the fact is deduced that a continuous flow of 1 foot of water per second will water from 80 to 100 acres of land. This has been fixed on as the unit of supply in making calculations.

A comprehensive system of irrigation sufficient to reach with artificial moisture most of the accessible lands of the arid region should include the storage of the water of the non-growing season, as well as the prompt distribution of the falling rains of spring and summer.

The plea that it is not the function of Government to undertake the irrigation of a million private farms and ranches, or that the national expenses are already sufficiently great without plunging into a new and stupendous enterprise which would entail the cost of many millions, has nothing to do with the question here presented, which is that the Government should at once incur a comparatively small expense in obtaining information of incalculable value. The knowledge that is sought by an irrigation survey is indispensable from any point of view. It can not be obtained by individuals, and unless the central plains are to be given up to permanent sterility the Government must seek it at once.

Congress is now asked to make provision for doing the work which it has directed to have done. An appropriation of $250,000 is asked to begin the survey of a million and a quarter square miles of arid land and to lay down the lines of knowledge on which 100,000,000 acres of such land can be redeemed from barrenness and delivered to the plow. This 100,000,000 acres would be worth, when irrigated, at least $2,800,000,000.

What is now asked, then, is that Congress shall appropriate $1 for every $11,200 of anticipated increase in national wealth, or 1 cent for every $112 which will be created by irrigation according to the most conservative estimate.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think that this is a measure of the highest beneficence that has been presented for our consideration. If there be nothing in the theory of government outside of the idea some of our people have that the only function of government is to create a court and a penitentiary and protect its citizens in their personal liberty—if that be the only function of government, as some of us construe it to be, then we have no right to consider a proposition of this enlarged beneficence to the people.

But if it be a part and a chief part of its objects to establish such public policies as will make the earth more productive and a better habitation for the millions of the children of toil and poverty who under every form of government have been its subjects, then we have attained a higher plane of civilization, and we are to look to policies like this measure, which shall make each individual, however poor, comfortable and give him the opportunity of a home, and the men who devote themselves to these policies should be rewarded and not punished with severe criticism and harsh judgment, then this conception of Major Powell will give him the applause and the respect of our country and the aid of the Government in accomplishing it.

Whatever can be said upon this subject has been so well said and so much better said than I can say it by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that I hesitate to express my own opinions. But as a member of the Senate I wish to record myself in favor of the policies on the part of the Government which will give to the people of this country better opportunities than have existed under any other form of government.

We are confronted with a condition of our civilization, which for some reason leaves the soil uncultivated in the older States and drives our people wherever public land can be found. We need not inquire why it is; the fact is so. From every State the tide of emigration has poured to the West, to the unoccupied lands belonging to the Government, and if we have a law which says they shall not enter and become the owners of them, they find a home upon them and make their living there. They are the American people and they realize the fact that the public domain of the Government is their heritage for their occupation, and they are right in my opinion.

Here is a vast area of land unsusceptible of present occupation and cultivation, but scientific inquiry, the investigation of this able and learned and laborious man—and whatever may be said of his administration of the office, it can not be said that it has not been disinterested, perfectly upright, and in the interest of the public service—Major Powell, has pointed out with every reasonable probability that it is possible to reclaim.

I submit the question, whose duty is it to prepare for that reclamation? What limited and narrow and impracticable theory of interpretation of the powers of government or of the wisdom of practical legislation shall say that if it be possible to make this vast area of public land the home of millions of industrious and worthy people it should not be done? What higher object of human effort or of wise legislation can be found than to make the desert land of the earth a bright and happy home for the children of toil—to make joy and happiness and abundance in the homes which now only know sorrow and penury and want?

Mr. President, there can be but one side to the question. This amendment does not preclude such legislation, if it shall be expedient, as will allow private co-operation to perform this work, to build these reservoirs, to create the canals and reservoirs which may be necessary. It only provides for the inquiry and points out the best method of doing it.

Who should be intrusted with this work? Is it the learned and practical scholar, surveyor, and geologist who has conceived the idea, and who in years of study and thought and calculation has satisfied himself until he thinks it is a demonstration that this great, beneficent work can be done? Is it the discoverer of this idea or some other person to whom the work of carrying out his own theory, his own idea, should be intrusted? I think Major Powell is very much the best person to whom it can be intrusted, and his bureau is the only one to which it can properly be committed.

Mr. President, there can be no doubt upon this subject. What do the engineers know about it? If the Government is to build these reservoirs there, probably the work may be intrusted to them, either the giving of contracts or otherwise; but what is the scientific knowledge that they possess on this subject compared with that which belongs to the Geological Survey, which requires all the higher sciences to be used in the daily performance of the duties which are imposed upon it, which is essentially a scientific bureau whose results are depended upon for accurate scientific knowledge?

This bureau is a credit to the Government, and under the able direction of Major Powell has given us a high standing amongst the nations in scientific investigation and research.

The practical utility of its operations is greater than we can see on the surface. It must not be forgotten that we are living in an age of wonderful discovery and practical use of the processes of nature, and that all knowledge is now being made the servant and ministers to the wants of man, and to the uses and necessities of a better and higher civilization which is only beginning to dawn upon us.

I am in favor of every method and every policy which is practicable and which leads to the improvement of the country and to making a better opportunity for our people for comfortable and abundant living and a better condition in life. Among those policies I have not heard of one which commends itself more to the thoughtful and intelligent mind than that of gathering the information, accurate and certain, which shall demonstrate the practicability, the cost, the specific method in which the vast surplus waters of the Rocky Mountains and the great streams that flow from them, and from all parts of our country, can be accumulated, stored, and thence distributed over the arid region of country.

I hail with great pleasure the opportunity of voting whatever reasonable sum is required for this purpose. I am not prepared to say that the sum mentioned here is too large or too small. I am, however, prepared to say that it will be in the hands of a discreet, upright, worthy, and capable servant of the Government, and that it will be administered for the purpose for which it is given.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] says decisively it ought to be a million dollars. He thinks we are legislating for posterity a thousand years hence. I think that we are gathering the information which will enable this Government to formulate a public policy which will immediately open these lands to the occupation of the poor people of the country, and that to withhold this legislation is to enable capitalists and rich men and corporations to take possession of the lands and extort a lifetime of labor from the people of the country who are obliged to make upon them their homes as the condition of occupying the heritage that belongs to the people.

My idea is, if you wish to allay discontent, the wise policies of Government are to provide the opportunities for labor, the opportunities for occupation of the soil, and its improvement for the people of this country. Of all monopolies the most hurtful is the ownership of the great body of the soil by those who neither live upon it nor labor upon it. This condition of things is the sure precursor of a popular discontent which not even standing armies can suppress.

But a people engaged in agriculture, owning their own land, under just laws and light taxes, will be the mainstay and defense of the Republic. I am, however, in favor of such a modification of this amendment as will withdraw the entire area of these lands to be benefited by this irrigation from entry until they can be opened to the homestead entry of the people, subject only to such tax or lien as will reimburse the people of the United States the money expended in their reclamation. This, however, can be done hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. BECK. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On page 63, after line 6, it is proposed to insert:

For the purpose of investigating the extent to which the arid region of the United States can be redeemed by irrigation, and the segregation of the irrigable lands in such arid region, and for the selection of sites for reservoirs and other hydraulic works necessary for the storage and utilization of water for irrigation and the prevention of floods and overflows and to make the necessary maps, including the pay of employés in field and in office, the cost of all instruments, apparatus, and materials, and all other necessary expenses connected therewith, the work to be performed by the Geological Survey, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $250,000. All titles to the public lands hereafter acquired shall be subject to the right of the United States to make reservations for reservoirs for storing water and for rights of way for ditches and canals for the purpose of irrigation.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I think this discussion has developed the fact that the Committee on Appropriations was very wise in not taking any action in regard to this matter. The measure embodied in this amendment had been referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which committee I suppose was the proper committee to deal with it, and failing to have action taken upon it there, it was sent as an amendment to be added to the sundry civil appropriation bill to a committee which never had an opportunity to examine it at all.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator from Kentucky that he is mistaken about the amendment having been referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORGAN. I never heard of it there.

Mr. TELLER. The amendment was not referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BECK. A bill for this purpose was referred to that committee, so the Senator from Nevada said.

Mr. TELLER. That was a bill to segregate the arid lands from other lands—an entirely different bill.

Mr. MORGAN. That bill applied to Colorado, did it not?

Mr. TELLER. No; the Senator from Nevada offered a bill, as I understand, for the purpose of segregating the arid lands from other lands. But that is not this measure by any means; it had no connection with it.

Mr. BECK. At any rate a proposition came to us dealing with this immense subject without having any approval from the Committee on Public Lands. I suppose that statement is correct. For one I agreed that whatever was done ought to be done in the Senate, and that our committee ought not to be required to deal with it.

We have appropriated for the Director of the Geological Survey, I believe, somewhere about $600,000, of which $200,000 is for the very purpose of doing the topographical work which is now sought to be extended for a specific purpose. As the chairman of the committee very well said, if that is not enough let somebody move to make it more, but let it go on in the general work of the bureau.

Here is a proposition to which I objected in committee and to which I object now, "for the purpose of investigating the extent to which the arid regions of the United States can be redeemed by irrigation, and the segregation of the irrigable lands in such arid region, and for the selection of sites for reservoirs and other hydraulic works" necessary for the purpose. I put the question to the Director when he was before the committee, and I said, as I believe now, that if you are going to take $250,000, or $500,000 as was first proposed, but $200,000 is all he could use this year to carry on the work upon which he said he would have to expend five million one hundred and some thousand dollars according to his own statement, ought not some legislation to be had so that men shall not follow your surveyors, so that your own surveyors and others or corporations elsewhere shall not follow you when you make these segregations, and under the land laws of the United States take possession of those places and exclude all the world from them?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Is it not the purpose of the amendment to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from sale just such lands as may be by the survey found to be proper places for the reservoirs, not for the purpose of allowing Congress to determine whether or not we shall enter upon the work?

Mr. BECK. It does not say so.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I do not think it can mean anything else.

Mr. BECK. But it says for the purpose of selecting sites. Let me read what the Director of the Geological Survey, whose paper was just now read at the desk, said to me when I asked him the question which I shall read. I had asked him what he was going to do after marking the sites for reservoirs and determining the ground for sites of canals and for headworks for irrigating purposes, and I put to him the following question:

Q. You mean by that the withholding from the public of such lands as in the opinion of the Geological Survey should be used for irrigating purposes?
A. It is to be decided hereafter what action should be taken.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How would you segregate them?
A. Simply mark out on the ground.

By Mr. BECK:

Q. Suppose some fellow should jump that claim as soon as it was marked out and say, "Here is a good thing; we have got it from the Geological Survey," what is going to prevent a squatter from taking it?
A. It is our purpose to mark it out so that the people will know what lands can be used for irrigation.
Q. It is just giving a fellow an intimation of where he can get a big thing?
A. Certainly; that is the very purpose.

That was his answer: "That is the very purpose." Then he went on to tell us that it could not be done by any individual and what, in his opinion, it would require. He said:

You must remember that the utilization of a large stream by the construction of a reservoir is going to take combined capital amounting to $500,000, $1,000,000, or $5,000,000, as the case may be. In order that these places may be utilized capitalists have got to go on, or else a community there has got to organize to do it. My judgment is, the best way is for a community to organize.

The meaning of all that is that without any legislation in advance, without guarding the rights of the United States, without having a report from any committee, we are to appropriate sums of money for him to locate and mark out the sites so that they can be taken up by any corporation under existing laws without guarding the rights of the actual settler who is there now, and who has his little irrigating ditch, and whose land is now being utilized, because under the laws of the United States he has the right to do so. They can cut off and hold in reservoirs the waters at the heads of the streams and prevent the men who are living along the banks of those streams from using the water, and there are thousands of those men to-day, with their ditches made and their lands irrigated to the extent of 80 or 160 acres, as we have all seen them who have been in the West. It is proposed to locate a site so that some great corporation shall take all the water and lease it out to them, and make them pay water-rent for every drop they get from this time on. Until their rights are guarded no authority to locate reservoirs ought to be given, and no privilege to anybody else to acquire title ought to be given.

What right would the men have who are along the valleys leading from the mountains where those streams run who have dug their ditches? I know along the Big Horn Valley (I go there nearly every year) there are hundreds of thousands of acres, a front of nearly a hundred miles, and running down 20 miles from those mountains, filled up with people. In a single county that I know there were not over ninety people eight years ago, and there are now nearly 10,000 prosperous farmers, who have dug their own ditches, made their own irrigation, and occupied their own land, and yet it is proposed to build a reservoir somewhere in the mountains and hold the water in the reservoir and destroy them all unless some corporation should raise a million dollars or $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 and dig their canals, as provided for here, and lease the water to those people. Yet it is said it is done for their benefit!

These things can all be guarded, and they ought to be guarded by legislation in advance, and the rights of the actual settlers and of those who have acquired rights now should be preserved before location is made or before anybody has the power to take hold of the work.

We inquired into all these matters with Major Powell. He went on and told us, as he very properly said, what immense amounts of land could be irrigated. It is being irrigated fast enough by the actual settler to-day for all practical purposes, and irrigated better than any corporation with its $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 could do by building a great reservoir, which the United States would establish for them, by leasing the water and owning the land or the canal and doling out the water to them as the corporation may see fit.

The people of the United States can take care of themselves in that regard if the Government will just let them alone; and with only 64,000,000 population, with a territory larger than all Europe with its 300,000,000 or 320,000,000, settlement is going on very satisfactorily now. We have given the Geological Survey $200,000 to go on and develop all these things in the usual way. I have protested all the time and protest now against locating sites for reservoirs and other hydraulic works until the rights of the actual settler are protected by a carefully drawn law.

The amendment does not belong to this bill. It is entering upon a great scheme that, if the Government is going to do the work, will take hundreds of millions of dollars. The survey alone will take over $5,000,000, so Major Powell told us; and while he is a scientific man, and while he is an honest man, and all that can be said about him I agree to, he is an enthusiast when he starts a scheme of that sort. The calculation that was read from the desk of how many millions and hundreds of millions of dollars this land will be worth when it is irrigated and the water developed is just a specimen of how they all do. We asked him how he could do this work. He said:

Twelve years ago I sent a volume of 200 pages as a report to Congress on this subject. What I wish to say further is, that if this irrigation work is to be done a general increase of my appropriations ought to be made. I could expand and get scientific men and experts to do both.

Yes he could; and he would draw in all the scientific men in the country; and he is drawing them in now as fast as he can. They are all willing to come in with their theories, and they are all willing, with the surplus in the Treasury, which is so much talked about, to expend as much as possible of it, under the pretense that they are doing good, when in truth and in fact, in my opinion, unless laws are passed before this specific direction is given to guard the rights of the people, it will be done as he says, very properly, the British do in India, by great communities, great corporations acting together, or as he says they do in Spain, all of which is laid down in his report, by methods that are absolutely unsuited to the wants, the tastes, or the capacities of the American people, each acting for himself. If we were living in communities as he says they do in India, where Great Britain manages her system, if we were living as in Spain under a despotism where the authority of the Government manages everything, that might do.

All his account of how these things would have to be done to utilize the land shows that the communities must either organize or the Government must do it or the great corporations must do it all, and the settlers must pay their water rents and become the retainers of the corporations who own the reservoirs.

It is a scheme that we ought not to go into, in my opinion, in this form without the most careful consideration. If we are going to do anything I agree with what the chairman of the committee said—if $200,000 is not enough to go on with the scientific survey make it $300,000, but let it go on as a part of the general system without fixing on places as sites to attract speculators to hold the water to the detriment of the people who are there. If you are not going to do that, and that is thought to be the best thing to do, then guard the rights of the men who are there or who go there hereafter by careful legislation from some committee that has power to look into it; but do not attach it to an appropriation bill to go at loose ends.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the imaginary evils which may arise under this provision—for they are purely imaginary—as suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], will be taken care of by the local governments. In the first place, it is not proposed to appropriate a single drop of water anywhere by this amendment. If the Senator had read the concluding clause he would have found that nobody could follow around the survey. It is proposed here that "all titles to the public lands hereafter acquired shall be subject to the right of the United States to make reservations for reservoirs for storing water, and for rights of way for ditches and canals, for the purpose of irrigation." Every man who buys a piece of land buys it with the right of the Government to allow a ditch to go across it. There is no danger of any monopoly.

The State of Colorado has taken possession of the water of the State by virtue of its constitution, and no ditch company or corporation of any kind can go and appropriate water and charge anything except what the public authorities say it may charge. The county commissioners where the ditch is fix the price at which the company may sell the water to the farmers.

Mr. STEWART. California has done the same thing.

Mr. TELLER. We had a good deal of trouble with a class of men who endeavored to appropriate the waters. An English company came in there and took our water and proposed to make the farmers pay $20 an acre, and in some places $40, and then to make them pay $1.50 an acre every year for the use of the water. But under our constitution the case was taken into the courts, and the courts held that they could not do it, and they were not allowed to do it. They county authorities go on and fix just what the company may be allowed to charge every year for the water. They fix it every year. The example of Colorado will be followed by every State in the Union where they have to irrigate. We were perhaps the pioneers in that respect.

I undertake to say that in no country in the world where irrigation is taking place has there been such care and attention given to preserving the water to the people as in Colorado, and it has formed the example for other States and Territories to follow, and I understand they are following it. The men who have their water rights are protected under the law just as they are protected in their rights of property. There is not a man in the State who has a farm who does not have an interest in it. Sometimes he buys the water and sometimes he owns the water, one or the other.

The Senator from Kansas said some rather hard things about the Director of the Geological Survey. I wish to say that he has had nothing to do with this movement. The joint resolution of March 20, 1888, was introduced by myself, and I know that the Director was never consulted about it in any shape or manner until after it was signed by the President, and then I consulted him myself.

The Senator from Kansas would have you understand that this is to take the people from Kansas and Nebraska and the other States, and immediately put them out on the arid plains. The Senator ought to know that it will take years and years before this work can be done. Very few of us will ever live to see the consummation of the plan.

What we want is the information. Then we can fix up a law that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] talks about, when we know what we can do, when we know what the capacity of the streams is. What is the use of a man going and building a dam across a natural basin unless he knows how much water there will come into it through the year?

That can only be learned by scientific application and examination, and that is what we want. That is the first thing to be had.

Then these places can be utilized, and if they are reserved, as the amendment proposes they may be reserved, they can be utilized only as Congress says they can. Congress will provide upon what terms the dams may be filled and used; that the party shall make himself subject to the laws of the State; that he shall not have any monopoly. To-day there is nothing to prevent any man from going in there and taking one of these places and filling it up with water and selling it for whatever he can get, except where the States have controlled the matter.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator let me interrupt him? What Colorado has done he states that the Government should do by this amendment.

Mr. TELLER. The Government is not to interfere with the States in regard to the matter. Nobody proposes to do that. We have not even asked the Government to build these reservoirs. We are building them ourselves, year by year. What we want to know is what amount of water in general may be saved. Take, for instance, the head of the Platte, which runs dry before it gets to Nebraska. Three or four times as much water could be sent down in dry seasons.

The agricultural season for irrigation does not exceed two months. Of course they can use and do use all the water, and there is enough for an ordinary season of two months, but there are at least eight months more when the water could be stored if there were dams built. The high water comes long before the people want to put it on the farms, and that is the time to store it.

Mr. President, the amendment is not pressed in the interest of a job as the Senator from Kansas would have it understood. It is pressed in the interest ot the great toiling masses of people who must live upon farms, and it is in the interest of the nation and the world that they should do so. The man who lives upon a farm is never an anarchist; he is never a communist; he is never a revolutionist. It is the men who live on farms who are the safety-valve of the nation and the world. The great cities are the pests which are a source of danger to the body-politic. The more men you can put on land to till it with their own hands, the better it is for the country.

It is the very highest necessity that every man who wants to work on land should have the opportunity to do so. If we pass, as we ought to pass, and as we undoubtedly will pass, a law to prevent any man from taking public land unless he lives on it and cultivates it (and we ought to have passed such a law years and years ago) there will not be any gobbling up of this land; there will not be any monopoly in water any more than there is in air.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to ask him if it is contemplated by the promoters of this scheme that the Government is to go on after this information is obtained and construct dams for the storage of water?

Mr. TELLER. It is not proposed that the Government shall do anything except to find out the facts. Then the Senator from Tennessee can pass upon those facts himself. He is a part of the legislative department, and I have do doubt, from what I hear, that he is likely to be here for many years to come, if he lives. I hope he will. He can then pass upon the question whether it would be politic for the Government to do it or not. The Government is not committed by this proposition.

Mr. HARRIS. The Government commits itself by it to the extent of a given amount of money to ascertain certain facts looking to the adoption of a policy in futuro.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly. That policy may be to say to the State of Colorado, "Within your borders you can store 10,000 acres of land with water. If you choose to store it we give you the land, but you must store it upon such and such terms; that is, it must be for the public good, and it must be for use by the public." The Government may not choose to say that to the State; it may say it to individuals It may say to the great capitalists of the East, "You may go on and fill these great basins; and if you do fill them you may fill them without paying us for the land, but you must be subject always to the constitution and laws of the State where the reservoirs lie, and they may have the right to fix the price at which you shall always sell when you have water."

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, would it not be just as legitimate to ask for the appropriations necessary to construct the dams and create reservoirs as to ask for an appropriation to ascertain the facts which are now sought?

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator mean to ask if the power exists?

Mr. HARRIS. Of course, I mean that.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator can not raise any question about the power. There are $199,000 appropriated in this bill for topographical examinations, and that is all that this proposed appropriation is. This is for a special topographical examination, and that is all of it.

Mr. HARRIS. But when this examination is made, and the locations designated, does not the Senator contemplate that appropriations will be asked for in the sundry civil appropriation bill hereafter for the construction of the dams and the making of the reservoirs?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, not at all. When the Government has done this work it may conclude to say to the State of Colorado, "We will give you all this arid land if you will improve it," just as it said to all the States, "We will give you the swamp land if you will improve it by drainage." The principle is the same. The Government may conclude to do that. Congress is not bound to anything. When the information is before us, I think we may safely trust the American Congress to legislate upon the subject. We can not legislate without the information. That is all we want; that is all we expect to obtain by this measure. When that is done, I will join the Senator in devising some scheme by which the reservoirs may be filled with water.

Mr. HARRIS. I am very confident myself that it will be followed up by a request for appropriations to construct reservoirs.

Mr. TELLER. I think if the appropriation ought not to be made there will be virtue enough in us while we are here to prevent it; and we ought to assume that the men who will follow us will have equal virtue and equal knowledge upon this question. We need not be afraid to get the information for fear that an improper use will be made of it next year, or ten years or twenty years from now. This is work that it will take a long time to do. We want the information. Nobody doubts but that at some time this will have to be done by somebody, when the country is crowded with people. The Senator from Kansas says that will not be for a long time to come. Is it wiser to wait till the people are crowded one upon another? Had we not better get this information so that those who want to do the work can go on and do it?

The Senator says there will be no water in Kansas; that there will be none coming down into Nebraska. If all the plains were being irrigated there would be more water in the Platte River. It has been demonstrated that if you take 160 acres of land and put water on it, perennial springs will be running where no water ran before. I can point in Colorado, and so in every irrigated country, to springs of water where in the early days there were no springs at all. I can show you limpid and pure lakes filled with fish and water fit to drink, where there were none in early days, totally the result of irrigation, and sometimes where the irrigation is miles away it fills the whole country with water. Nebraska will have water where she does not have it now in the Platte, and so in the Arkansas River.

I stated to the Committee on Appropriations the other day that in one place there is an area of 20,000 acres that can be filled with water that would irrigate a million acres if it was full, but it requires a ditch of 20 or 30 miles long to fill it, and nobody wants to go and fill it; there is no way a man can buy the land; but if we enter on some system, which we shall do when we find what we can do, we shall say to some company, perhaps, or to the State of Colorado, "Fill that basin with water." To-day, if I fill it, I should be sued, perhaps, by the Government of the United States for destroying its land. We are not prepared, first, to get the legislation the Senator from Kansas talks about. First get the information and then let the legislation come afterwards.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the general question before the Senate, but I desire to call the attention of the gentlemen who are considering it to the language of the closing part of this amendment:

All titles to the public lands hereafter acquired shall be subject to the right of the United States to make reservations for reservoirs for storing water, and for rights of way for ditches and canals, for the purpose of irrigation.

I do not know what the meaning of the draughter of the amendment was when he said "all titles to the public lands hereafter acquired." I suppose it does not mean lands to be acquired by the Government. If it did that would be another question. He evidently has reference to lands to be acquired by private owners. That brings up the question so forcibly presented by the Senator from Kentucky, that when this survey shall be made and the points designated for reservoirs the lucky men who happen to find the places so designated will take up that land. Having taken it up——

Mr. BOWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. REAGAN. Let me make my statement, and I will conclude in a moment. Having taken it up the right of the Government is reserved.

All titles to the public lands hereafter acquired shall be subject to the right of the United States to make reservations for storing water.

How subject? Not as vacant land, because it is preceded by the statement that the land is to be acquired. The title being acquired, all the right conferred by this amendment now exists, the right of condemnation; and when the public survey has designated one of these important places, and a private person or a corporation has taken possession of it, as undoubtedly will be the case, and the Government seeks to condemn it, it will then have to pay the augmented price; it may be the enormous price that may be demanded for it on account of its peculiar fitness for the construction of a reservoir.

I desire to call attention to this language because it seems to be treated as if some right of the Government was being reserved that is valuable. The Government can now condemn any land for public use by paying the price for it, and when the title is in a private party it can do no more under the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I would like to suggest to the Senator from Texas that the Government has the right, supposing this survey was made, to withdraw the land without any law.

Mr. REAGAN. I know the Government has the right to withdraw it, but there is no provision in this clause for withdrawing it. The whole debate shows that there is no purpose to withdraw the land, but to go on and make a survey and leave it subject to be seized by the men who follow and watch the operations of the surveyor.

Mr. TELLER. If the Government reserves the right to flood it with water, I think that is all that is necessary.

Mr. BOWEN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the language of the amendment:

All titles to the public lands hereafter acquired shall be subject to the right of the United States—

I call attention of the Senator to the fact that there is no question as to the title to the public lands, and no question as to how the title to public lands can be acquired except from the Government. What public lands are there except those belonging to the Government. The language is broad enough to cover the whole question:

All titles to the public lands hereafter acquired shall be subject to the right of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose that means acquired by individuals. It can not mean by the Government.

Mr. BOWEN. There is no means of acquiring public lands by individuals except from the Government.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I suggest to the Senator that that is intended to provide for exactly the difficulty that the Senator from Texas awhile ago was complaining of. He said that as soon as these locations are made people will go and take up these lands. The intention of the amendment is to prevent exactly that thing.

Mr. BOWEN. And it does so thoroughly.

Mr. REAGAN. I may be somewhat obtuse; I may lack acuteness enough to comprehend language, but the reading of this is—

All titles to the public lands hereafter acquired—

By whom? Not by the Government of the United States, for it owns the lands. It must be by private individuals.

Mr. BOWEN. From the Government.

Mr. REAGAN. From the Government, of course, and after they have acquired title from the Government, the difficulty of the gentleman is that he does not seem to see the point I am trying to present, and that I can not present as well as the Senator from Kentucky did, that when these surveys are made the men who choose to follow the surveyor and ascertain where the selected place for a reservoir is, will, under the general land laws, sit down upon that land and take it up. There is nothing to prevent that in this, nothing in the amendment, nothing in the general law to prevent it.

Mr. HARRIS. The criticism of the Senator from Texas strikes my mind with force, that the right is reserved to the Government to subject the lands, even though acquired by private citizens, to this particular purpose. The amendment, however, ought to state the terms upon which they may be so subjected.

Mr. REAGAN. If the amendment means to reserve the land, it ought to say that the land is reserved, and when the land is acquired by private individuals, then the rights of the Government ought to be asserted. That is not the way to express the idea of reserving the land. There is nothing in the amendment that indicates a purpose to reserve the lands.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will make a motion to that effect.

Mr. REAGAN. I simply desired to call attention to it.

Mr. TELLER. I think the language used is sufficient, but if not I move to add the following:

And as fast as such sites for reservoirs shall be surveyed, such sites shall be in a state of reservation until the President shall otherwise order.

The survey will put it in a state of reservation until the President shall otherwise order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

Mr. TELLER. That will meet the objection of the Senator from Texas.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment:

And as fast as such sites for reservations shall be surveyed such sites shall be in a state of reservation until the President shall otherwise order.

Mr. BOWEN. There can be no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think there may be a misapprehension as to the full effect of this amendment. This amendment is not for the purpose of acquiring information solely, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] stated. It is for the purpose of embarking the Government in a new field of activity as respects these lands. Now, under existing law, the Director of the Geological Survey does classify these lands; he does separate them. The law requires him to do so.

Mr. TELLER. Where is the law?

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator has any doubt about it I can turn him to the law.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to see it.

Mr. ALLISON. It is found substantially repeated in this appropriation bill, on page 61, which, if I remember it rightly, is almost in the exact phraseology of the existing law as respects the duties of the Geological Survey:

For the Geological Survey, and the classification of the public lands, and examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and the products of the national domain, and to continue the preparation of a geological map of the United States, etc.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to say that that has never been construed to be a general classification, but simply a distinction between mineral and other lands. I will venture to say that in the ten years that that has been the law—and it has been about ten years—there never has been an attempt to classify the lands as arid lands and non-arid lands.

Mr. ALLISON. Not only has that been done, but Major Powell presented to the Committee on Appropriations skeleton maps, showing not merely a classification of the mining lands, of the agricultural lands, and the arid lands, but also the irrigable lands, and those maps were in the committee-room, and if the Senator will allow me I will quote for a moment——

Mr. TELLER. I understand that.

Mr. ALLISON. The Director is required to make a classification of these lands, and Major Powell in his statement before the committee said that everything has been done that this amendment requires to be done, except only the location of reservoirs and the staking out of the canals, etc., for the purposes of irrigation.

I read from page 112 of the committee's report some questions put by me to Major Powell, and his answers:

Q. I would like to have you go on and state your plan.
A. The plan is to make a topographical survey of the whole region, and that we are proceeding to do already under the law.
Q. You do that under your general appropriation?
A. We do that under our general appropriation. We are going on to make that map, and in thirty years we shall have it done, as we are going on now. The first thing, then, is a topographical map. Upon that map we want to segregate and lay out the areas which can be redeemed by irrigation.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me finish this—then to select the sites for canals and headworks, the dams and works necessary to divert the water from natural channels into artificial lakes. The sites for the reservoirs should be selected for that purpose. That is all, so far as the method has been laid before me, that it is proposed the surveys should do. The future policy of the Government in regard to those lands is not a question for a geological survey to discuss, yet I wish to say a few words on that subject.

So I agree with the Senator from Colorado that this amendment does not propose that the Government shall enter upon the construction of anals and reservoirs, but the amendment involves the idea that the Government shall go into these mountain regions and, in addition to making a topographical map, which will show the irrigable lands, the mineral lands, and the agricultural lands, shall also segregate and separate by a survey the irrigable lands from other lands, and shall go there and separate or segregate that portion which is suitable for reservoirs, and then shall mark out and lay down upon that map surveys of canals, extending the system along the irrigable lands, and, if necessary, make reservoirs, one reservoir beginning, if you please, in the headwaters of the Missouri River and running along the valley of the Yellowstone, marking out a reservoir at the source of the Yellowstone and then going along that valley and at another point lower down make another reservoir, and carry this water along in this way until it reaches the plains below.

That is what Major Powell proposes to do by this survey. He proposes not only to make the topographical map, which he is now doing, but to go on and make these additional surveys.

I think that the criticism is well taken which says that this separation of irrigable lands by survey and the establishment of reservoirs can very well be postponed—I mean for the time being.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator right there if he knows to what extent, under existing law, the headwaters of these streams are being annually appropriated, and does he know how fast the difficulties are accumulating unless this survey is made and this reservation is made?

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt that difficulties are accumulating year by year with the settlement of the country, and that these difficulties have accumulated; but what I object to is the segregation of the irrigable lands by survey made and the establishment now of reservoirs until such time as we have more thoroughly completed the topographical survey.

The real trouble with Major Powell and with this appropriation is that we have limited in this bill the aggregate appropriation for Major Powell's Geological Survey to $402,000. He wants and estimated for $500,000.

No man in the Chamber has a higher opinion of Major Powell's scientific attainments than I have, or greater respect for his high ability. I regard him as an exceptional man in the scientific service of this Government; but is it not perfectly natural for him to chafe as he does under what he regards as an insufficiency of appropriation for the purpose of carrying on this great survey?

When this survey was begun it was intended as a survey for the public domain only, and by the insertion in this Chamber in 1879, or perhaps in 1881, of three little words in an appropriation bill, which authorized this survey to extend itself into the States of this Union, and by its extension into those non-public-land States, this great bureau was enlarged so as to contemplate and comprehend a complete geological survey of the entire area of the United States, and that survey now has been going on for some years under the annual appropriation of about $400,000.

It is apparent to every one who has examined into the details of that survey that at this rate of progress the survey will not be completed within this generation; that probably another generation will be required to complete it. Major Powell's pride and ambition are wrapped up in this survey, and he desires to complete it, and in this bill there are $199,000 appropriated for topographical surveys.

He tells us in his statement that 80 per cent. of this $250,000 would also be so used. Now, what I believe is the wise thing for Congress to do at this session, supposing, as I do, that the main measure will be wise to do in the future, is to enlarge this appropriation for topographical surveys and provide that this additional sum which is proposed shall be used in these high, mountainous regions and in the Territories of the United States, and that if any portion of the geological survey is postponed it shall be that portion which lies in the older States of this Union.

In the very nature of things this survey has been partial in the past. Major Powell has been compelled, and I suppose wisely, or at least he has done so, to send scientific parties into a few States of the Union. They have gone into the Southern and the Western and the Northeastern States as well. This survey, although we have appropriated now annually for nearly eight years $400,000, has not yet touched the State in which I live; he has not yet found it convenient, with this limited appropriation, to go into many of the States of the Union. Finding himself cribbed and confined by this limited appropriation by Congress, it is the most natural thing that he should seek to enlarge the area of his power and the extent of his surveys by asking for specific appropriations for specific purposes.

Mr. TELLER. I will say to the Senator that he did not know of it. Senators here asked for it, and not Major Powell.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not say that he originated this plan.

Mr. TELLER. He had nothing to do with it.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, I accept that statement; I have no doubt it is exactly true, but I venture the statement that Major Powell favors this plan. It is his favorite plan, as the Senator from Colorado well knows. I remember, and the Senator from Alabama well remembers, that some two or three years ago we had that question under discussion in a committee of which he was a member and I was also a member, and that Major Powell brought forth his report of 200 pages, made ten years ago, in which he proposed that this system of irrigation should be carried on in an extensive scale in this country.

I am willing, and I believe it would be a wise thing to do, to enlarge the appropriation for topographical surveys. I am willing, for one, that those surveys shall be extended into this region in order that Major Powell may have in hand what he proposes to do in the future; but I submit now that for us to undertake the great work of segregating these irrigable lands by survey or laying out these reservoirs, without some legislation upon the subject that will take care of these areas after they are segregated and as this survey progresses, is premature action. That is what I say.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, if this thing is to be delayed the obtaining of scientific information of the rocks in the older States should be postponed, and a great deal of this work should be postponed; but if this legislation is delayed it will be useless in the future. One-half of the waters in those arid regions are already hampered by people acquiring title under your land laws, and there must be a reservation or your legislation segregating the arable lands from other land will be useless.

Mr. DAWES. It is within the power of the President, as I understand, to-day to take away these lands, segregate them, and keep them from the settler who goes in and appropriates the headwaters, just as much as it will be under this proposed system, because you do not require of him to do it under this system; you leave it to his discretion to do it under this system precisely as he exercises his discretion now, with this addition, that when you make these surveys you draw to these spots those who desire to appropriate the lands, and the lands will pass out of your control altogether.

Mr. STEWART. Let me reply to that.

Mr. DAWES. I want to say that I am for pressing this kind of work to the utmost, but along with it I favor such machinery as will save the land, not such machinery as will draw the attention to it of those who desire to appropriate it to themselves.

Mr. STEWART. Exactly; and if the Senator would read the amendment and understand it, he would see that it is just in the line of what he proposes to do.

Mr. DAWES. Let us hear what it is.

Mr. STEWART. The amendment is:

All titles to the public lands hereafter acquired shall be subject to the right of the United States to make reservations for reservoirs for storing water, and for rights of way for ditches and canals, for the purpose of irrigation.

And in addition it has been already amended.

Mr. DAWES. That does not reach my idea. My idea is that when you make these reservoirs and provide for these ditches you should reserve the land for future use. Unless you do that, you only invite to these points those who desire to appropriate them.

Mr. STEWART. I understand the situation. There is no inviting about it at all. It is understood perfectly well. A lot of cattlemen are now monopolizing and trying to get locations at the headwaters. The object of this is to make it possible to get the reservation. That is the object of it, and if the language is not strong enough to make a reservation, let us amend it.

Mr. DAWES. I ask if ten cattlemen will not go there, after it is pointed out on the geological map where the reservoir must be, where one goes now?

Mr. STEWART. Let two hundred go or ten thousand go; if it is reserved they can not take it.

Mr. DAWES. What the Senator read to me does not cover it.

Mr. TELLER. I ask to have the amendment read which was accepted by my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And as fast as such sites for reservoirs shall be surveyed, such sites shall be in a state of reservation until the President shall otherwise order.

Mr. STEWART. If this language is not sufficient to reserve the rights of the United States and reserve land for reservoirs, let us have it put in that condition. That was the intention, to make reservations and have them apply at once, because if you delay this matter you will have nothing to reserve, and it is all nonsense to talk about the public surveys calling attention to this matter. This country is overrun by the cattlemen and others intending to monopolize water and prevent the use of it for irrigation. That is constant. The intention of the language was to reserve from to-day rights of way for places for reservoirs, so that the country could be utilized.

You are going on now with your geological survey in other States, and if this language is not sufficient make it sufficient. That is the intention of it. I believe it covers it. If the wit of man can devise any further reservation, let us do it. It will not be worth anything ten years from now unless you act promptly. It is not worth now more than half as much as it was ten years ago. I think the language as originally framed was sufficient to reserve not only the places for reservoirs but for the lines of ditches.

All titles to the public lands hereafter acquired shall be subject to the right of the United States to make reservations for reservoirs for storing water, and for rights of way for ditches and canals for the purpose of irrigation.

The United States reserved the right to make these reservations, and no matter who goes on he goes with that understanding; there is no hardship, because the places are high in the mountains; and then the addition is that as soon as the survey is made it remains a reservation until the President shall otherwise order. The making this survey is nothing new in regard to public lands. Senators talk about its being a new principle. In surveying the public lands from the beginning there have been segregations of timber land, segregations of mineral land, and others; but there is no appropriation for this great work in your law. Your appropriations in this bill are for surveying public lands and sectionizing them.

Mr. ALLISON. Classifying them.

Mr. STEWART. I am glad that word is mentioned. Classifying them means arranging them according to the geological formation, and you will find it does not depend upon the topography how they shall be classified, but it depends upon the geological formation, whether it is granite, slate, lime, or some other formation. You classify the lands in that way, whether mineral and what kind of mineral, and you state generally whether land can be irrigated. I defy the Senator to take a map and show a line drawn between lands that can be irrigated and cultivated and lands that can not.

This necessary work has not been done; it has been neglected; and because it has been neglected the Senators from Colorado and myself commenced early at this session and called the attention of the Department and of Major Powell to it. Major Powell said nothing about it to us until we called his attention to it that that country was being filled up; under existing laws there were titles being acquired that would make irrigation hereafter impossible, and it was necessary to segregate the land and reserve places for reservoirs, and necessary to do it now, not to postpone it, not to do something else, not going on with a half-accomplished survey. You say it is a duty to segregate, and you want to do that. You want to go on and make a topographical survey and have it half finished, and go over it again. You will double the expense by proceeding in that way. It is very little expense when we first make a topographical survey to designate the places for the reservoirs.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the amendment which has been read here does not reach the objection which lay in my mind. It is not touched by the amendment. The amendment only proposes to reserve the spot where the reservoir is to be and the line over which the ditches are to be run, and leaves all the land that is to utilize the water open to these men and pointed out by the survey for the very men who are to gather it up and appropriate it away from the settler in the future. That is my objection. If the Senator will make his amendment broad enough to reserve the lands to be irrigated as well as the spots on which the reservoirs are to be built, I will go with him in appropriating just as much money for that purpose as can be wisely and economically expended, and I will do what I can to draw off the work from the old States, if it be necessary, and devote it entirely to the preservation and development of the great wealth of these mountain and arid lands. But for the purpose of facilitating speculation——

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, there——

Mr. DAWES. Let me finish this remark. But for the purpose of facilitating and pointing out to those who are to gather their cattle on these hills and in these valleys around and appropriate all the land that is to be benefited by these reservoirs is the objection which lies in my mind.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator fails to remember that no man can get a foot of this land except under the homestead law. A speculator can not get it. There is no private entry about it.

Mr. DAWES. My dear sir, I do not know much about public lands, and I never served on the Public Lands Committee; but I have seen something.

Mr. MORGAN. I state the law of the United States just as it is. There is no law applicable in that country to the public domain except the homestead law and the timber-culture laws.

Mr. DAWES. Are not all the land laws of the United States applicable there? Is it not the fact that under the existing land laws of the United States it so happens that men have got thousands and thousands of acres in one title without paying one dollar beyond appropriating the lands under existing laws? I do not know how it is done, but I only know it is done.

Mr. MORGAN. Such a thing as that might have occurred and probably has occurred in some instances by an abuse of the laws. I can not say there were not such abuses certainly, but I think there has been very much less than we are apt to imagine. But under the laws of the United States no man can acquire a title to the public domain in that country unless he is an actual settler on the public lands under some of the forms of entry—timber-culture, pre-emption, or homestead.

Mr. DAWES. It matters not whether it is done under an abuse of the existing land laws or in some other way. It is a fact that all Northern Dakota, all the region about there, is in great land holdings and a curse to the country, held by corporations of foreign capitalists; and now does the Senator think that the abuse will cease the moment the temptation becomes the stronger and the opportunity the greater? We have been talking session after session of the revision of the land laws. The Senator has helped me and helped others who had occasion to deal with this subject in covering lands that have been opened lately to the public in attempts to prevent the very thing that I am afraid will be applied to every acre of land that is to be irrigated by these reservoirs.

I repeat, if it can be made clear to me that when the reservoirs are reserved and the line of the ditches is reserved and all this plan, great as it is, shall be perfected, the extent of territory that is to be blessed by these proceedings shall be for the settler, when it is made certain that it shall be for the homesteader and him alone, I will go as far as any Senator on this floor in making an appropriation to carry out that end; but I do not want to draw the attention of the speculator and the land-grabber to the point where best he can profit under existing laws.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the speculator and the land-grabber, the cattleman and all that can go out to that country and make their selections of waters at the heads of the different streams just as intelligently, perhaps with quite as much wisdom as will obtain in such selections after we have made a topographical survey. They know exactly what they want; they know where the water is, and they know how to use it. We do not draw attention merely to the fact of the existence of advantages out there for the storage of water in reservoirs by making this survey. That is not the danger we have to encounter. The danger was stated by the Senator from Colorado.

These wise, sagacious men are out there now using the homestead and other laws of the United States; perhaps they employ a litte perjury along with it occasionally, in the exercise of their diligence to use the laws of the United States to seize upon these reservoirs of water, these places for storage of water, which the Government of the United States ought to protect against private ownership, which ought to be kept in public ownership, so that whenever we get ready either through the States or any other agency at all, we can build the dams and make the reservoirs and have the water in storage.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts, because the homestead laws are abused occasionally, and are certainly liable to abuse, would not repeal the homestead laws; he would not repeal, perhaps, the timber-culture laws; he might not repeal the irrigation laws. I think the timber-culture and irrigation laws might very well be repealed; but whoever goes upon the public domain west of the Mississippi River and acquires title from the United States must do it in virtue of actual occupancy. He must make his home there, and he can not acquire title in any other way. So that shuts out the speculator in the first instance.

Perhaps, after a man gets his title he may have to sell to somebody who has more money than he has, and a company comes along and takes up his land. He can not prevent that except it be a foreign corporation, and foreign people are not able to make him go and do it. All we can do is in the initial step, in passing the title from the first holder, to guard it with all proper restrictions and guards. That we have done in our laws. The laws are ample on that question.

I do not know that they can be improved at all. So the danger that the Senater from Massachusetts apprehends does not exist, or if it does exist you can not provide against it unless you close your land offices and say that no more public land shall go under private ownership.

We ought to encourage the expansion of the population of this country into homesteads. The Senator from Colorado put that very powerfully before the Senate, and there is no one single point connected with the general policy of this country that is more valuable than inducing our people to go and scatter themselves abroad in agricultural pursuits upon the homesteads we grant them. It is a great and wise public policy. I have seen the necessity of having a different system in reference to my own State, by repealing the law which allowed private entry at a dollar and a quarter an acre, so that every person who gets a tract of land from the Government of the United States now must do it in virtue of an actual settlement upon that land. He can not do it in any other way.

Now we reserve these lands in these tops of the mountains, build dams, make reservoirs; we reserve the right to dig ditches, and in giving title to the land there is the condition attached by the amendment here that the Government reserves the right of making the reservoirs and the right of carrying the water by ditches across the land. That may probably, and I think will, save the necessity of a regular condemnation of the land under judicial procedure.

I think it a wise provision to put in here. We may find it necessary to improve it by some more specific legislation, but it was a wise provision in this amendment. It does reserve the reservoir; it does reserve the right of way for ditches, and it leaves the land as we are obliged to leave it, subject to homestead entry. I want the homesteaders to get the benefit of it. I do not want to shut these people out from it. It is in the general law. The law provides for it. The law could not be really amended so as to make it any stronger than it is now.

Mr. DAWES. Is it not just as much within our power to amend the law so that all these lands shall be open to homestead entry only, as it is to amend the land laws so as to say that all the lands shall be subject to the right of the United States to construct reservoirs?

Mr. MORGAN. That goes off into a very broad field and in which there is a great deal of disputation in both branches of Congress. For instance, I will take the timber-culture system. No man can deny that that timber-culture system has worked a great amount of good. It has planted forests of trees in many Western States where heretofore there was not a bush growing, and, as I observed awhile ago, it is supposed, and I believe it is true, that it has attracted the rainfall to that section of the world.

We can not, on a bill like this, amend the whole land-law system of the United States, so as to strike out the timber-culture feature. It is a subject of serious debate whether it ought to go out of the law or not. And so in regard to the private right of irrigation, where a man or a number of men take a section of land and draw water upon it; they must pay for that land a dollar and a quarter an acre after they get the irrigation in.

Perhaps that might be well stricken out of the general law of the land, but yet there are some localities of the West where it would operate very injuriously to repeal that law. Some beautiful farms exist in the West now abounding in agricultural products that have grown up under this irrigation law, and it is rather a hard thing to get Congress to consent to change a system which has yielded substantial benefits in the past. So it is not necessary to put it on this bill.

This is a mere preliminary provision whereby the areas and localities may be ascertained for the storage of water, accompanied, however, with the additional provision here now that the mere survey segregates the land from the public domain to that extent that it is only open to homestead entry. That is the whole measure, and it seems to me it is a very wise provision and that there is actually no danger in it.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for what has been offered. After the word "dollars," in line 12, this is to come in as a substitute for all that follows that word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 12 of the amendment, it is proposed to insert as a substitute the following:

And all the lands which may be designated for reservoirs, canals, and ditches for irrigation, shall be reserved as the property of the United States, and shall not be subjected to entry or settlement until hereafter provided for by law.

Mr. REAGAN. I will state the object I have in view in the proposed amendment. The language, as it stands, is certainly confused and uncertain, and at all events contemplates the investiture of titles in private parties. My amendment takes all trouble out of it, and provides that, if these surveys shall be made, the land designated for reservoirs, canals, and ditches for irrigation, shall be reserved from entry.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Texas that if he would strike out the word "ditches" his amendment would be all right. There is no probability that the ditches will be surveyed at all for years. The first thing is to find the reservoirs. You may want to run that water 50 miles down these streams or 200 miles, it may be, before you take it out, and it is not to be expected that there will be any ditches surveyed under this at all.

Mr. REAGAN. Following the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado, I will strike out the word "ditches."

Mr. BOWEN. We will accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as modified will be reported.

The SECRETARY. The proposed modification is to strike out the word "ditches;" so as to read:

And all the lands which may be designated for reservoirs and canals for irrigation shall be reserved as the property of the United States, and shall not be subjected to entry or settlement until hereafter provided for by law.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I share the ideas of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in regard to this matter, and I think that land subject to irrigation ought to be reserved from entry and settlement as soon as these surveys are made. The amendment now proposed does not go to that extent. It reserves the sites of the reservoirs, but does not reserve the whole extent of the land now belonging to the United States which would be benefited by this improvement.

Mr. TELLER. I would like to make a suggestion to the Senator. I can show him the impracticability of reserving the land. For instance, I will suggest to the Senator that on the Laramie River there is a place which with probably half a million dollars can be made a great sea that would irrigate thousands and tens of thousands of acres below that may be surveyed, and yet there are thousands of acres below there that still may be watered by the Platte River, and if we should reserve all the land that could be watered we should reserve all the land that still has not been taken.

Take the Arkansas River. A number of large reservoirs could be built on the headwaters of the Arkansas River if they should be selected, and then to reserve all the land that could be irrigated from them would be to reserve thousands of acres that will be and could be irrigated by the natural flow of the stream. So it is utterly impossible to do that, because at the head of the stream there is an opportunity to make a reservoir ten or twenty years from now all the land will have been reserved. The whole thing would be valueless if that was done, and I know the Senator means to give sympathy and help accomplish what I desire.

Mr. CALL. It does not appear to me that there is any difficulty in making exceptions of those classes in the amendment by inserting the words "except such lands as are subject to irrigation independent of the reservoirs established by the Government." Any language of that kind will meet those cases which are suggested by the Senator from Colorado, "except all lands that may be or shall be irrigated by other methods."

There is another reason, Mr. President. While I am in favor of doing everything that will make this country habitable and give homes to the people, and require the land to be used for no other purpose than to give it to them upon the condition of occupation and settlement, some one has to pay the expense of this great work. The people of the United States not living there must pay the money by which this is to be done. Now, I think it is very proper that the money and the credit of the Government should be thus applied; but why should it not be made a charge upon this land? And if you give it to the people who are to occupy it, why not give it upon condition that its improved and increased value shall pay to the Treasury of the United States simply the cost of this improvement? That might be done by a tax upon water imposed by the Government by water rates. But the whole field of legislation in this respect will be in the hands of Congress if the lands shall be reserved.

Now it occurs to me that for this purpose this amendment should take effect, separating and reserving as soon as surveyed all the public lands of the United States that shall be benefited by this improvement, with an exception, to meet the cases suggested by the Senator from Colorado, of all such lands as may be irrigated without resorting to this method.

I think it would not be difficult to embrace both these ideas. I do not wish this movement, which is a movement in favor of the people and against the acquisition of this land by corporations, to be embarrassed by that suggestion. The interests of the land monopolists are against this improvement by the people of the United States, and I desire that it shall stand forth as a beneficent measure in the interest of the cultivators and the occupiers of the soil.

I am not unfriendly to corporations in the proper sense of the word. They are a great instrument of modern civilization. But we need not legislate for their benefit, and we are not legislating for their benefit when we seek to make the public lands of the country habitable and subject alone to ownership for occupation and settlement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. TELLER. I understood that was accepted by the mover of the original amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment last proposed by the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BOWEN. I accepted that amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. It has to be voted on.

Mr. TELLER. My colleague has a right to modify his amendment, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last amendment of the Senator from Texas was to strike out and insert certain other matter entirely. If the Senator from Colorado is quite sure it is understood, the Chair will announce that that amendment is agreed to; and the question now recurs upon agreeing to the amendment as amended. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BATE. Will the Chair be good enough to restate the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] as amended on the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. The entire proposition is now before the Senate for its action. The amendment will be read that there may be no misunderstanding.

The SECRETARY. On page 63, after line 6, it is proposed to add:

For the purpose of investigating the extent to which the arid region of the United States can be redeemed by irrigation, and the segregation of the irrigable lands in such arid region, and for the selection of sites for reservoirs and other hydraulic works necessary for the storage and utilization of water for irrigation and the prevention of floods and overflows, and to make the necessary maps, including the pay of employés in field and in office, the cost of all instruments, apparatus, and materials, and all other necessary expenses connected therewith, the work to be performed by the Geological Survey, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $250,000. And all the lands which may be designated for reservoirs and canals for irrigation shall be reserved as the property of the United States, and shall not be subjected to entry or settlement until hereafter provided for by law.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. MITCHELL (when Mr. DOLPH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. DOLPH] is detained from the Senate by sickness in his family. If he were here he would vote "yea." He is paired generally with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN. I voted because I was informed by the Senator's colleague [Mr. MITCHELL] that he would vote the same way if he were here.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. Does the other Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] know how his colleague would probably vote on this if he were present?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not, Mr. President, but I believe he would vote against it, as I do, for reasons that I did not take time to state.

Mr. HARRIS. I vote "nay" upon the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MANDERSON (when Mr. PADDOCK's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]; but on this question I feel at liberty to vote.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were here, he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. I do not know how either Senator would vote if present.

Mr. PALMER. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore I withhold my vote. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. STEWART. I will pair him with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Indiana is already paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER], who is detained on account of illness, and understanding that if present he might possibly vote differently from what I have done, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CALL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PASCO] is detained from the Senate by necessary business and is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. I desire to state that I think my colleague, if present, would vote "yea;" so that the Senator from Illinois is at liberty to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 18; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 57, line 5, after the words "General Land Office," I move to insert "and the Bureau of Education."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 57, line 5, after the words "Land Office," it is proposed to insert the words "and Bureau of Education."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In connection with that amendment I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, July 30, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: I observe that by the sundry civil bill, as it has been reported by the Committee on Appropriations to the Senate, the only repeal of the act of March 3, 1887, which required the removal of the General Land Office, Bureau of Railroads, and Bureau of Education to the Pension building, provided for is so much as relates to the Land Office. I do most sincerely think it will be a serious injury to the Educational Bureau and also to the Pension Bureau to compel the removal of the former into the Pension building. It can not but practically strangle the Bureau of Education for a considerable period, at least. and I can not see but that it must seriously interfere with its usefulness so long as it shall remain there. There are now about forty-three clerks and people employed in the Bureau of Education, and they have a large collection of books, models, educational appliances, and bric-a-brac of various character and all contributory to enlightenment. I have visited the Pension building and can not see how this can be stored, except in great part, in the fourth story. Practically, it becomes when placed there unavailable for use.

The appropriation in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill on account of the Bureau of Education is, altogether, $50,920. The rent of the building to be saved by this change is $4,000. In order to save this sum of $4,000 of rent I do not hesitate to say that this action will waste $25,000 of the appropriation for the bureau.

I have heard the idea expressed in casual conversation that the Bureau of Education was not an instrumentality of especial value, and I fear that this idea has had something to do with the willingness to cripple it by this removal.

I do not concur at all in the sentiment; but if the sentiment is to have any influence, and especially under the plea of economy, it should take an effective direction to accomplish the latter end; and this would require that, in case of this removal being insisted upon, a great part of the force should be discharged and the appropriation made for the conduct of the bureau diminished. I do not doubt that it could be diminished one-half, upon the theory of the removal, and as effective work be accomplished as if the same number of officers and employés shall be retained, now provided for, because they can not work to advantage in such quarters as can be assigned in the Pension Bureau.

The legislative bill has made provision for the rent of the building now occupied by the Bureau of Education only until the 1st of December next, appropriating $1,667 for that purpose, one-third of the annual rental. The time is short and the pressure upon Congress, and especially upon you, my dear sir, I recognize to be very great at this juncture. Is it not the part of wisdom to continue that bureau where it is for the remainder of this fiscal year, which will involve but $2,333 more (perhaps less than the cost of its removal), and review this subject at the next session with more attention than can now be allowed to it?

If it be possible for yourself, or some member of the committee, to give an hour or an hour and a half to a personal examination of the circumstances, I feel convinced you will recognize by a survey of the buildings and the property involved the imperative urgency and wisdom of the suggestion I venture to make.

The provision for the post-office within the area of the Pension building will make that building as thoroughly occupied as almost any Government building in the city, perhaps quite as much.

I have the honor to be, my dear Mr. Chairman,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. F. VILAS, Secretary.

Hon. WM. B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. In this immediate connection, if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will permit me, and I feel greatly gratified to hear him move that amendment, I will ask to have printed also in the RECORD, with the matter that he sent to the desk, other matter that I have here bearing on the same subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the other matter, Mr. President? The Senator ought to describe it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will explain this amendment briefly to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed communications desired to be inserted in the RECORD will be read, if there be no objection. The Senator from Vermont desires to know their contents.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not care to have them read. I asked the Senator from New Hampshire to state the substance.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not know that the Senator referred to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The documents sent to the desk will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF EDUCATION,
Washington, D. C., July 30, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I have recently made several visits to the Pension building with a view of learning what accommodations can be secured therein for the Bureau of Education. At your suggestion I give you the result of my observations and inquiries.

The building consists of three-columned arcades one above the other——

Mr. ALLISON. I hardly think the Senator will care to have the communication read in full.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not ask to have it read.

Mr. ALLISON. We do not really care to have a description of the Pension building.

Mr. PLUMB. Let the communication be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks that the matter proposed to be inserted in the RECORD may be read.

Mr. BLAIR. I will withdraw the matter, if the Senate will permit me. It is important matter, but I can use it at some other time just exactly as well, if the Secretary will return it to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter will be withdrawn if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. There are ways enough to get pertinent matter into the RECORD.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend by adding at the foot of page 9 the matter that I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of page 9—

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to purchase, or acquire by condemnation proceedings, or otherwise, a site, and to cause to be erected at the city of Atchison, in the State of Kansas, a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices in said city, with fire-proof vaults extending to each story. The site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $75,000; and the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of said site and the completion of said building: Provided, That there shall be an open space of not less than 50 feet upon every side of said building, including streets and alleys, and that no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to said site shall be vested in the United States and the State of Kansas shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

Mr. ALLISON. This is, I believe, one of a series of amendments intended to be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. I suppose the amendment to be in order, and therefore I leave the question to the Senate to decide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that there are a series of amendments of the same character to be submitted.

Mr. BECK. Let me inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether there has not been a bill passed by both Houses that covers this?

Mr. SPOONER. This bill has passed the Senate, but it has not passed the House. It is reported favorably by a standing committee of the Senate, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations twenty-four hours before this time; so that makes it in order under the rules.

Mr. BECK. Does the Chair decide the question of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of order has not yet been made. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] announced the opinion that the amendment was in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that that amendment was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. SPOONER. That is what the Senator from Wisconsin has stated.

Mr. HARRIS. And a bill has already passed the Senate providing for the same building?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think there can be any question about the amendment being in order.

Mr. BECK. I desire only to say a word. I am not objecting to this particular provision, and I am very sure that a building for a post-office at San Francisco ought to pass if it is in order. I may exaggerate, but my recollection is that there are some forty-four or forty-five bills of this character that have now passed the Senate and are pending in the House. They are not yet law, and I understand that the Committee on Appropriations, as far as we were concerned, adopted the rule, and we suppose that that was the law; that until there was a law authorizing the construction of a building it was not in order in an appropriation bill to provide for it; that it was new legislation, no matter how it was recommended or how it was passed, or by what committee; that it was legislation absolutely new, there being no law authorizing the construction of public buildings at those places.

Now, what I rose to say was this: If the Senate decides otherwise, then I assume that all the forty or fifty bills that have passed the Senate but have not yet passed the House are also in order here, and will all have to go on this bill, because the Senate has recognized the propriety of these buildings being erected by passing bills for that purpose, so that it just opens the door.

Mr. VEST. Are there any buildings appropriated for in this bill except such as have been authorized by law?

Mr. BECK. No, not one. I believe I am right about that. There is no appropriation for a public building in this bill except for those that have been authorized by law.

Mr. ALLISON. No amendment has been recommended by the Committee on Appropriations for public buildings except in cases where bills authorizing their construction have passed both Houses and been signed by the President.

Mr. BECK. Now, if the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to tack onto this bill all the bills that have passed the Senate and not passed the House, that is for the Senate to determine, and I desire the matter to be fairly understood. I ask whether it is in order to have bills put on in that way?

Mr. ALDRICH. I submit an amendment to the sundry civil bill and move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. I also desire to offer an amendment to the sundry civil bill and move its reference to the Committee on Manufactures.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the amendment this day submitted by Mr. ALDRICH, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil bill, reported it favorably, and moved its reference to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Kentucky to raise the point of order on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BECK. I believe I ought to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to enable the President of the Senate to examine——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not require any interval for examination. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 31, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 30, 1888.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 30, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ERMENTROUT, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. CLARDY, for ten days.

To Mr. GOFF, indefinitely, on account of important business.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF LABOR.

The SPEAKER. On Saturday morning the House passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of a number of copies of the third annual report of the Commissioner of Labor, and it went to the Senate. It should have been a joint resolution, as it makes an appropriation out of the Treasury; and if there be no objection the Senate will be requested to return the resolution to the House in order that it may be corrected. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (S. 2316) reserving the right of pre-emption to Jesse A. Corn; and

A bill (S. 2624) to provide for the enlargement of the dimensions of the wharf at Fortress Monroe.

MARY E. HOPKINS.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask, by unanimous consent, that the House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1914) for the relief of Mary E. Hopkins, and that the same be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Mary E. Hopkins, widow of Alfred Hopkins, late a captain in the Navy of the United States, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,156.64, being for the salary of said Alfred Hopkins, on leave pay, from the 21st day of November, 1882, to the 24th day of September, 1884.

Mr. SPRINGER. On a former occasion when unanimous consent was requested to consider this bill I objected, but since that time I have taken pains to examine it, and I am satisfied it is such a one as should be allowed, and I will, therefore, not object. The House had previously determined on the restoration of Hopkins to his rank, and therefore it is simply carrying out what the House has already ordered to be done.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the report had better be read.

The SPEAKER. This is a Senate bill, and therefore there is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the Senate report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there is a House report on the same subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that will be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think if the report is lengthy the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] can make a statement of the facts in less time than would be consumed by reading the report.

Mr. FORAN. I desire to say for the information of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that Captain Hopkins was court-martialed in the time of Secretary Chandler, a few years ago. The House took up a bill for the purpose of restoring him to his rank, and during that discussion, while the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] was in the chair, the House passed the bill and it went to the Senate. While pending there Captain Hopkins died, and this bill is to give the widow the amount of pay he would have received. The bill is a very meritorious one, and I think it should be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House bill on the same subject will be ordered to lie on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, and that the same be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa. Is there objection?

Mr. STRUBLE. The report made is of some length, and I ask by unanimous consent to make a brief statement of the facts. This is a city that has 30,000 inhabitants now, and is growing rapidly. For five years past United States court has been held there. That court has occupied the county court-house, but the business of the State courts has so much increased that there is now a conflict between the State courts and the United States courts in the matter of time of sessions and occupancy of room. The United States court occupies the auditorium and the State courts have to go to one of the smaller rooms of the court-house. The bill makes an appropriation for $150,000. The original proposition was for $200,000, but it has been reduced to $150,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRACEY. I object.

Mr. STRUBLE. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

COPYRIGHT BILL.

Mr. COLLINS. I ask by unanimous consent to have read and considered the resolution which I send up to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 6th of December, 1888, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of Senate bill 554, "to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like an explanation of that.

Mr. ROGERS. Is that the copyright bill?

Mr. COLLINS. It is.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask by unanimous consent that we now consider and adopt a resolution providing that the roll be called, and that each member may have an opportunity to call up a measure.

The SPEAKER. For what length of time?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. For any length of time sufficient to complete the call of the roll.

Mr. BURROWS. That is a matter of such very great importance that it ought to emanate from the Committee on Rules.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SIOUX CITY.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] has withdrawn his objection to the bill of which I asked consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has withdrawn his objection. Is there further objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

An act (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, or acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the United States district and circuit courts, internal-revenue office post-office, and other Government offices, at the city of Sioux City, Iowa. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $150,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $150,000: Provided, That of said sum not exceeding $50,000 shall be expended for the acquisition of said site: And provided further, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and that no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Iowa shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein. For the purpose of this act the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read.

Mr. STRUBLE. If the gentleman will waive that request I shall be obliged to him as the report is rather long. I am perfectly willing to give the gentleman any information he desires about this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I think the gentleman should make a statement as to the size of this city and the necessity for this building.

Mr. STRUBLE. It is a city of thirty thousand people and is growing rapidly. The United States courts have been held there for five years and there is a conflict as to the occupancy of the court-house between the two courts when they are in session, the court-room proper being occupied by the Federal court while the State court is compelled to hold its sessions in one of the smaller rooms in the building. The business of the place and of the United States courts is growing very rapidly. The post-office was made first class on July 1; the net revenue was over $24,000 last year. Furthermore, Iowa has had but $40,000 for public buildings this session; and it certainly is but just that she should receive fair consideration at the bar of this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the amount of this appropriation?

Mr. STRUBLE. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman think that is rather too much?

Mr. STRUBLE. I do not think it is too much for a growing city like that, which is increasing so rapidly in both population and business; on the contrary the amount should be much larger.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Is this bill recommended unanimously by both Houses?

Mr. STRUBLE. It is reported unanimously by the Public Buildings Committees of both Houses, there being at this time a House bill on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE]?

There was no objection.

The committee recommended amendments as follows:

In line 12 strike out "$250,000" and insert "$150,000."
In line 22 strike out "$250,000" and insert "$150,000."
In line 35 strike out "$250,000" and insert "$150,000."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STRUBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill as amended was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The House bill (H. R. 7600) for the same purpose was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, Mr. Speaker, one gentleman on either side having had recognition, I ask unanimous consent that the roll be called for gentlemen to make requests for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] objected to that a few minutes ago.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But the gentleman from Michigan objected probably in order that his side of the House might have a hearing. Now they have had recognition, and, in the interest of all the members of this House and in the interest of fair play, I make the request that the roll be called for requests for unanimous consent, and that the call be continued until the names of all the members have been called.

Mr. ROGERS. I am compelled to object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then let us have the regular order.

PUBLIC BUILDING, CHARLOTTE, N. C.

The SPEAKER. The House having passed the Senate bill to provide for a public building at Charlotte, N. C., if there be no objection the House bill for the same purpose (H. R. 8721) will be laid on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Manufactures may have leave to sit during the recess, in order to continue its investigation into the subject of "trusts." Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Are we going to have any recess, Mr. Speaker? [Laughter].

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. BUCHANAN. We have leave now to sit during the sessions of the House.

A MEMBER. Are we going to have a report from that committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that question.

Mr. REED. Regular order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I hope the regular order will not be called until this matter is disposed of. This consent is imperatively necessary in order to complete the work of the committee. We make a preliminary report this morning.

Mr. REED. From the Committee on Manufactures? I withdraw my demand for the regular order.

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

AMALGAMATION OF HUMAN SPECIES.

Mr. WHEELER introduced a bill (H. R. 11036) to ascertain and exhibit the physical effects upon offspring resulting from the amalgamation of human species; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Eleventh Census, and ordered to be printed.

THE POSTAL TABLET.

Mr. BAKER, of Illinois (by request), offered the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be, and is hereby, directed to inquire into and report upon allowing an article known as the postal tablet, or private postal-card, the weight of which shall not exceed half an ounce, to pass through the mails at the rate of 1 cent for postage.

PUBLIC RESERVATION IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. HOLMAN, by request, introduced a bill (H. R. 11037) to set apart a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico as a public reservation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

Mr. HAYES offered the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be allowed an annual clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until March 4, 1889, at the rate of $2,000 per annum, and the Committee on Appropriations is hereby instructed to make provision for such clerk at the said rate of $2,000 per annum from March 4, 1889.

MESSENGERS IN HOUSE POST-OFFICE.

Mr. TARSNEY introduced a resolution continuing the three session messengers employed in the House post-office until the commencement of the second session of the Fiftieth Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

COMMERCE.

Mr. CLARDY introduced a bill (H. R. 11038) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF "TRUSTS."

Mr. BACON introduced a resolution to make immediately available funds to continue the investigation of "trusts," etc., by the Committee on Manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

ADDITIONAL TAXES UNDER ACT OF MARCH 3, 1875.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, introduced a bill (H. R. 11039) for the relief of certain persons who paid additional taxes assessed against them under the act of March 3, 1875; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LAND DISTRICT IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. MCKINLEY introduced a bill (H. R. 11040) to create the Colmon land district in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

TEXAS STATE FAIR.

Mr. ABBOTT introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 209) authorizing the several Executive Departments of the Government to loan to the Texas State fair and Dallas exposition certain articles for exhibit; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

Mr. RICHARDSON introduced a concurrent resolution to print 5,000 additional copies of the report of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this Congress it shall be in order immediately after the approval of the Journal to proceed in the House as in Committee of the Whole to the consideration, for the period of one hour, of bills and resolutions which shall have been previously reported by standing committees of the House, and such reports printed, and Senate bills and resolutions on the Speaker's table or referred, which, or substantially similar, measures shall have received favorable action and report of appropriate House committees, in the following manner:

The Speaker shall call the standing committees in their order, when by direction of such committee so called one measure may be called up for consideration; if not more than five members object, such consideration shall proceed: Provided, That debate on each measure shall be limited to ten minutes, to be equally divided for and against the measure, exclusive of not exceeding five minutes which may be occupied in reading the committee report on the measure; this hour not to interfere with revenue or appropriation bills, or reports of conference committees.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 27) providing for the printing of a supplement to Wharton's Digest of International Law.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1082) to authorize the issuance of patent to certain land in Arkansas.

The message also announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 907) to provide for the erection of a public building at Charlotte, N. C.; asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. SPOONER, Mr. RANSOM, and Mr. PASCO.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions having been concluded, the regular order is now the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BURNES. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HERBERT. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] will yield a moment I desire to have the House consider the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs on the bill (H. R. 10556) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that the House agree to the report submitted Saturday last recommending concurrence in certain amendments and non-concurrence in others; and I also ask that a conference with the Senate be requested.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the following report:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, who have had under consideration the Senate amendments to H. R. 10556, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes," submit the following report and recommendations:

There were seventy-five amendments reported in the bill as it came from the Senate. The committee, after full consideration of the same, recommend concurrence in the amendments numbered respectively as follows:

Amendments numbered 1, 2, 9, 10, 12, and 13.

Also, concurrence in Senate amendment numbered 16, with amendments in line 315, after the word "Mexico;" so as to make the remainder of the line read: "and the South Atlantic coast for navy-yards and dry-docks, and for."

They also recommend concurrence in amendments numbered 17, 19, 26, 30, 31, 32, 33, 36, 42, 43, 44, 50, 52, 54, 61, and 69.

The committee recommend non-concurrence in the amendments as follows:

Amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 14, 15, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 34, 35, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 53, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75.

They also recommend that line 977 be amended by inserting after the word "construction" the words "steam machinery and armament."

Also, that the words "construction and steam machinery," where they occur in line 1031, be stricken out.

Also, that the word "or," where it occurs in lines 1033 and 1035, be stricken out, and that the word "and" be inserted in lieu thereof in each line.

Also, that the words "with their engine, boilers, and machinery," be inserted in line 1033, after the word "Congress" and before the word "and."

Also, that the word "armament," in line 1037, be stricken out.

They recommend concurrence in amendment numbered 75 with the following amendments, that is to say, strike out the words "and armament" in line 1042, insert between the words "Annapolis" and "to," in line 1044, the words "except when in emergencies it may be used for other purposes," and by inserting "sixty" in the place of "seventy-five" in line 1047.

The report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the House will ask for a conference with the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on this bill. The Chair hears no objection. The Chair will announce the appointment of the House conferees during the day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the same order be made in reference to the Army bill that has just been made in reference to the naval bill, that is to say, to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the Senate amendments, and consider them in the House.

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope unanimous consent will be given to file reports.

Mr. BURNES. After this motion is determined, I will make that request.

The motion to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. Now I ask that all members having reports to make may be permitted to file them with the Clerk at the desk.

There was no objection.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

PUBLIC BUILDING, ALLENTOWN, PA.

Mr. SOWDEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10927) for the erection of a public building at Allentown, Pa.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. B. GREEN.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 9179) granting a pension to W. B. Green; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN WINCHELL.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 10662) to allow John Winchell arrears of pensions; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported back, in the nature of a substitute for the foregoing, a bill (H. R. 11041) granting an increase of pension to John Winchell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TEMPY M. JOHNSTON.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9169) granting a pension to Tempy M. Johnston; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CAPT. WILLIAM J. DULEY.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9310) granting a pension to Capt. William J. Duley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NANCY HAMILTON.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10882) granting a pension to Nancy Hamilton; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FIDELIA E. MEAD.

Mr. BLISS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10016) granting an increase of pension to Fidelia E. Mead, widow of the late George L. Mead; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PERMELIA SMITH.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10879) increasing the pension of Permelia Smith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON RYAN.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10629) granting a pension to Washington Ryan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NATHANIEL CRAIN.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10167) increasing the pension of Nathaniel Crain; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH F. GARRETT.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 6501) to grant a pension to Joseph F. Garrett; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. ELIZABETH G. SCOTT.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 944) increasing the pension of Mrs. Elizabeth G. Scott; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY B. HOOK.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1412) granting an increase of pension to Mary B. Hook; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PIERRE BOTTINEAU.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2713) granting a pension to Pierre Bottineau; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES SIMS.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9277) for the relief of James Sims; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SYLVESTER STEARNS.

Mr. YODER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 7516) to increase the pension of Sylvester Stearns; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL NEIKIRK.

Mr. YODER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7185) granting a pension to Samuel Neikirk; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES R. BELL.

Mr. YODER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3911) granting a pension to James R. Bell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MALINDA FOREMAN.

Mr. YODER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 2717) granting a pension to Malinda Foreman, widow and minor children of William H. Foreman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN T. BROWN.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9014) for the relief of John T. Brown; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY VANBUSKIRK.

Mr. BLISS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11029) for the relief of Mary Vanbuskirk; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF TRUSTS.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I have a report that I desire to have printed——

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent has just been given to file reports.

Mr. BACON. I know, but this is a report that I desire to ask consent to have printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

The report (from the Committee on Manufactures) was referred to the House Calendar.

It is as follows:

The Committee on Manufactures respectfully report that acting under the authority and direction of a resolution of this House passed on the 25th day of January, 1888, they have proceeded to investigate and inquire into the matters and things referred to in said resolution, and having examined witnesses and papers in relation thereto, they have been unable to complete such inquiry and investigation and respectfully report the following resolution with the recommendation that it do pass.

Your committee further report that the names of various combinations and trusts have been, from time to time, furnished to your committee, that the number of such combinations is very large, and that your committee in calling witnesses and taking testimony proceeded upon the following plan of investigation, i. e., to inquire:

First. With relation to trusts or combinations in lines of business which are connected with or use articles in which there exists a competition in our markets between the domestic product and the foreign product imported and dutiable under our tariff laws.

Second. With relation to such combinations dealing in articles which are not imported into this country or are not subject to import duties.

Third. With relation to such combinations dealing in articles which are subject to taxation under the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

Your committee has particularly directed its inquiry into the methods of and the extent of the business done or controlled by the sugar trust and the Standard Oil trust, and respectfully submit herewith the testimony taken before it in relation to these two trusts.

In submitting this testimony your committee desire to call the attention of the House to the form of organization of these two trusts. Both of them are organized upon substantially the same plan. From the testimony it appears that there exists a certain number of corporations organized under the laws of the different States and subject to their control; that these corporations have issued their stock to various individuals, and that these individual stockholders have surrendered their stock to the trustees named in the agreement creating these trusts and accepted in lieu thereof certificates issued by the trustees named therein. The agreements provide that the various corporations whose stock is surrendered to the trustees shall preserve their identity and carry on their business. In the sugar trust agreement the provision is that the several corporations shall maintain their separate organization, and each shall carry on and conduct its own business.

In the Standard Oil Trust agreement it is provided that all property, real and personal, assets and business shall be transferred to and vested in the said several companies. The duties of the trustees are restricted to the receipt of the dividends declared by the various corporations and the distribution of the aggregate of them to the holders of the trust's certificates, pro rata, and to holding and voting upon the stock of the corporations. The trustees in both cases, upon the stand as witnesses, specifically denied that the trustees, as such, ever do any other business than to receive and distribute these dividends and exercise the only other functions given to them by the trust agreements—that is, to hold the stock of the various corporations and exercise the right of stockholders in such corporation.

The care with which the trustees avoid making any agreement relating to commodities appears from the testimony as to the arrangement made with the Oil Producers' Association in the fall of 1887. The officers of the Producers' Association testified that an arrangement was then made with the Standard Oil trust by which 5,000,000 barrels of oil belonging to the Standard Oil trust was set apart for the benefit of the association upon its agreeing to curtail the production of crude oil at least 17,500 barrels per diem. These witnesses undoubtedly understand that their arrangement was with the trustees of the Standard Oil trust. But the written agreement produced and now in evidence shows that it was made with and is signed by the Standard Oil Company of New York, one of the companies whose stock is held by the trustees, and that the Standard Oil trust or the trustees thereof as such are not parties to it, nor is either of them responsible for the carrying out of that agreement.

This form of combination was obviously devised for the purpose of relieving the trusts and trustees from the charge of any breach of the conspiracy laws of the various States, or of being a combination to regulate or control the price or production of any commodity; hence they assert that the corporations themselves which control and regulate the price of commodities and the extent of production, and have tangible property, remain with their organization intact and distinct, and not in combination with each other; that the stockholders who owned only the stock, and by well-settled legal rules had no legal title in the property of the corporations entered into the agreements and sold their stock in the corporations and accepted in payment trust certificates, and that the trustees receive and hold only the stock of corporations and have no legal title to any of the property of the corporations, and neither buy nor sell anything nor combine with any one to fix prices or regulate production of any commodity.

Your committee have deemed it proper to call attention to this feature of these combinations, because it is believed that it will be found that all trade combinations having similar aims either have adopted this method or speedily will do so; and also because the legislation which has been proposed to this House and referred to your committee has been directed against combinations to fix the price or regulate the production of articles of merchandise or commerce. It is plain that the two combinations, the testimony concerning which is herewith submitted, have been intentionally formed so as to avoid, if possible, the charge that the trust, as such, or the trustees in that capacity, either fixed the price or regulated the production of any article of merchandise or commerce.

Complaint having been made to him by citizens of the State of New York against the sugar trust, and one of the corporations whose stock it holds, the attorney-general of that State has, after hearing, directed prosecutions to be commenced against that trust and the corporation complained of upon grounds which are set forth in an elaborate opinion which is submitted as part of the evidence in relation to that trust, and as containing a careful statement of the law of that State so far as it affords any remedy against such trusts.

ANNIE GIBSON YATES.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent to make a report recommending non-concurrence in Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 7708) to increase the pension of Annie Gibson Yates, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of further considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURNES. I desire, if possible, to proceed now with the question of the limitation of general debate. Some suggestions have been made in reference to it, and I presume the committee understands about all the differences on both sides. In the mean time some negotiations have taken place here, and some discussion also that probably has but little relevancy to the issues presented by the pending bill; and it might be well to agree now that the general debate between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] and my colleague [Mr. STONE] should be concluded, say in thirty minutes, and that thereafter, there being no further desire for general debate, by unanimous consent it be concluded upon that part of the bill, then proceed to consider it section by section in committee, and when the final section is reached relating to the French spoliation claims there shall then be allowed general debate for a period of four and a half hours on each side.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand at the time the Chair recognized the gentleman on Saturday. At that time it was understood that the gentleman was being recognized in the time of his colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES]. In fact it is the universal custom of the House to recognize members of the committee having charge of the bill first, and not to allow the debate or the control of the debate to pass from the hands of the committee, and particularly of the member of the committee having control of the bill.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I do not see how the Chair could have reached any such understanding, for I went to the Chair and asked him to recognize me. I rose in my place and was recognized in my own right.

Mr. BURNES. The statement of the Chair is entirely correct; but the gentleman will remember that he applied to me for time. I told him——

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I did go to my colleague and ask him for time, but I was recognized by the Chair in my own right.

Mr. BURNES. Well, how much time does my colleague want?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I wish to make a statement first. I went to the Chair and asked how much longer the general debate was going to run, or whether there was any limitation upon it. He said that no limitation had been put upon it; that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], as I understood, made some objection, although I do not know what the suggestion was exactly—at all events, that the general debate had not been closed—and told me that I could rise in my own right and take the floor.

Mr. BURNES. I wish simply to ask my colleague, if he will permit me, how much time he desires.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I claim the hour to which I was entitled.

Mr. ROGERS. In order to preserve the integrity of the proceedings, and that there may be no mistake about this, the RECORD shows, on page 7659, that when the gentleman from Missouri yielded the floor to his colleague on Saturday to move that the committee rise, he stated:

I presume I will retain the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the gentleman will be entitled to the floor when the committee again resumes its session.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct, and the Chair so holds; but, at the same time, the Chair understood that the gentleman was occupying the floor in the time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES]. The Chair never would have taken the control of the floor from the gentleman from Missouri having charge of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be stated how much time has been occupied by the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman spoke for twenty minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope he will be allowed to have the balance of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. That would leave ten minutes of the hour remaining to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that his time be extended for the forty minutes.

Mr. BURNES. By unanimous consent let that arrangement be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I object.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. For the remainder of my own hour; that is all I ask.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I do object decidedly. First of all, I do not know that I ought to give any reasons particularly for doing so, but I think the whole debate is extraneous to the bill, and at this stage of the session it is improper to have debate on a question where the attack is made originally by the gentleman from Missouri upon the gentleman from Illinois and the reply is made, which ought to wash out all elements of disturbance between the two. We are now considering a bill which is in the hands of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], and I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. There can be no agreement.

Mr. FARQUHAR. On an explanation from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] I withdraw my objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is the proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. STONE] be permitted to occupy the floor at this time for forty minutes, being the remainder of an hour; the gentleman having commenced his remarks when the House was last in Committee of the Whole on this bill.

Mr. REED. Is it the understanding that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] shall have fifteen minutes at the close? Unless that is done I object.

Mr. BURNES. I appeal to my colleague to yield fifteen minutes of the time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Say ten minutes.

Mr. PAYSON. Unless I should desire it, I am quite willing that he gentleman should use it all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Before that is put to the House, I wish to understand the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The first proposition was that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE], now upon the floor, be permitted to speak for forty minutes, and the present proposition is that he be permitted to control thirty minutes of that time, and that the remaining ten minutes be given to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], if he desires. Otherwise the time will be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Did I not understand the Chair to say that the gentleman from Missouri, having had the floor last, he was entitled to it, forty minutes of his time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has time given to him by his colleague [Mr. BURNES] who is in charge of the bill.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I claim the floor in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair could not recognize the gentleman except by consent of his colleague [Mr. BURNES], who has control of the debate on this bill. The Chair will again state the proposition. It is proposed that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] be permitted to speak for thirty minutes, and that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] desires to occupy ten minutes after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, he may do so; but that otherwise the gentleman from Missouri may occupy the full forty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I understand the proposition is simply this: That the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] may occupy the floor thirty minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] ten minutes if he so desires.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what has been submitted at this time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If this arrangement is perfected there will be nothing which will preclude gentlemen speaking to the bill itself.

The CHAIRMAN. That will depend upon the further order of the committee.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I object, unless I can have my own time. I will not agree to proceed at all unless that shall be conceded. I think I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. TRACEY. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is assuming that he has taken the floor from his colleague, who has the management of the bill. That would be without precedent in parliamentary law.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I ask that I may occupy the time for forty minutes.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration House bill 10896, the general deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills; and pending that motion I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole general debate upon that part of the bill preceding the last section be limited to forty minutes; thirty minutes of which shall be at the disposal of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and ten minutes under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I move to amend by making it fifty minutes, ten minutes to be under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], and forty minutes under my control.

Mr. BURNES. I hope that proposition will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 10896; and pending that moves that the general debate upon the whole bill, except the last section, be closed in forty minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] to indulge me for just a moment. We will save time by allowing it to be fifty minutes instead of forty minutes, and I hope he will accede to that modification. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has prepared himself to make response to the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], and he ought to have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. BUCHANAN. He made the attack.

Mr. BURNES. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNES. We desire also, while proceeding with this bill section by section, to reserve the right of debate on the last section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. BURNES. Now, will it be in order to move that general debate upon the last section of the bill be limited to four and a half hours on each side?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion would not be in order except by unanimous consent. The motion already made is not in order, but the Chair supposed it was based upon an understanding, as no objection was made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The House does not understand the motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that general debate on all the bill, except on the last section, be limited to forty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The point of order I make is that it is not competent for the House at this time to make such an order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated. The Chair has stated that, under the rules, the House can proceed without limiting the debate, but if limited at all it must be on the entire bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] makes the point of order against the motion, and the point is sustained. The question, then, is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

Mr. BURNES. I now ask unanimous consent that general debate on the sections of this bill, exclusive of the last, shall be limited to fifty minutes, forty of which shall be under the control of my colleague from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and ten under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON]; and that on the last section of the bill, when reached, general debate shall be limited to four hours and a half on each side.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has just concluded a carefully prepared speech on the subject of land grants and forfeitures, which he delivered with some degree of emphasis. Just why the speech should be made at this time I am at a loss to understand. The House is considering an appropriation bill with which land grants and forfeitures have absolutely nothing to do. Three weeks ago we had the land-grant forfeiture bills before the House. At that time, on July 5, I addressed the House at some length in support of forfeiting all lands where the railroad companies had not complied with the law, and the gentleman from Illinois addressed the House in opposition to the view I was urging. I had supposed the debate which was had at that time, and which consumed several hours, would end the discussion on that subject at least for this session. But for some reason my friend and his party associates here seem not to be satisfied.

They revive it again unexpectedly and in connection with a measure where it is wholly impertinent. I suppose the gentlemen on the other side have concluded it is necessary to make some further defense of the land policies pursued during the period of Republican domination, and have spurred my friend to the front again to assume that arduous and somewhat perilous task.

My friend says there is not now, and never has been, anything in the nature of politics in the questions growing out of our public lands; that they are, and have always been, purely economic questions. That may be, but I had supposed that political parties are often divided on economic questions. There may be no politics in the public lands, but nevertheless it is a fact that both the great political parties of this day have made very definite and pronounced history in connection with our public lands.

In the speech I made here on the 5th of the present month I endeavored to epitomize that history so as to show the broad and radical difference in the policies which prevailed while the two parties were respectively in power. Upon the facts drawn from that history I made, as I had a right to make, such legitimate arguments as those facts justified in vindication of the policies and achievements of the Democratic party, and to the just condemnation of the policies and achievements of the party to which the distinguished gentleman from Illinois belongs.

To show that politics and parties have nothing to do with land grants and forfeitures the gentleman from Illinois calls attention to the grant of lands made to the State of Illinois in 1850, to be used by that State to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Ohio River, and says that is the first grant ever made by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad. That is correct; that was the first grant of that kind. But the gentleman said also that when that grant was made in 1850 there was a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President. That is not correct. The President at that time was Millard Fillmore, and I think he was never accused of being a Democrat.

Mr. PAYSON. I should have said a Democratic Congress. The Executive at that time was a Whig.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I said, Mr. Chairman, in the remarks I took occasion to submit on July 5, that the Democratic party, as well as other parties previous to 1861, had made grants of the public lands to certain States of the Union to aid those States in the development and prosecution of enterprises of paramount importance to the States themselves. Those grants were asked for by the States and were made at their instance.

I printed in my remarks of that date a table containing an exhibit of every grant made from the foundation of the Government to this date, either to the States or to corporations, giving the dates of the several grants, the amounts covered by each grant, and the grantees in each instance.

The first grant named in that table as being made to any State to aid in the construction of a railroad is the grant referred to by my friend from Illinois.

There is nothing I wish to conceal, there is nothing the Democratic party could desire to conceal in all this history.

Proceeding further, my friend quoted a remark from my speech of July 5, in which I said substantially that when the Republican party came into control of public affairs in 1861 entirely new methods and policies were inaugurated with reference to the management and disposition of our public lands. That statement he controverts, and says that there is not a shadow of foundation in fact for it. The statement of my friend is that there is not a shadow of foundation in fact for it. I did make that statement, and I stand by it. It is literally true. I assert now that prior to 1861, when the Republican party assumed control of public affairs, not a solitary acre of the public lands was ever granted to a corporation.

Mr. PAYSON. That is conceded.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. And I say that after the Republican party assumed control of public affairs on March 4, 1861, and between that date and 1874, that party did grant directly to railroad corporations tens of millions and hundreds of millions of acres of the public lands.

Mr. PAYSON. Would it interrupt the gentleman to ask him a question?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. One moment. Let me ask you a question first. Do you concede, as you did a moment ago, that from 1861 to 1874, the Republican party, or Republican Congresses with the approval of Republican Executives, did grant directly to railroad corporations the public lands to the extent I have indicated?

Mr. PAYSON. I do not concede it. I regard myself as being very unfortunate in the use of the English language if I have not been able to make myself understood when I have said that the grants to which the gentleman refers were made by Congress between the years named by him, but were made without regard to politics one way or the other.

Mr. HOLMAN. But that does not answer the question.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Then the gentleman admits that between the years I have named grants of the character and to the amount I have indicated were made to corporations?

Mr. PAYSON. Grants of that character were made to the transcontinental routes, and to them only; the acreage of which grants will appear in the tables which I have furnished and which are identical with those which the gentleman himself used in his former speech.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Then my friend, while admitting the grants were made by Republican Congresses, seeks to break the force of my statement by saying that the grants were made without reference to the question of party. He admits the grants were made directly to railroad corporations, and made for the first time in that way during the years from 1861 to 1874, but says they "were made without regard to politics one way or the other."

But my friend well knows it to be a fact, admits it to be a fact, that in each of the Congresses making those grants there was an overwhelming Republican majority in both branches and very few Democrats in either. He also knows it to be a fact that during those years the Presidency and every department of the Government were in the control of the Republican party. Now, I insist, as I have a right to insist, that where a Congress overwhelmingly in the control of a certain political party shall enact certain measures into legislation, and those measures shall receive the executive approval of a President who belongs to the same party, that party must be responsible for the legislation. The rule is a just one, and can not be abrogated or denied if there is to be any such thing as party responsibility.

Why, sirs, the Democratic party prior to 1861 made some land grants to certain States to aid them in the construction of railroads and canals and wagon-roads and for river-improvement purposes. I presume that gentlemen attached to other political parties in both Houses of Congress voted for those measures; but I seek to escape no political or party responsibility for those measures.

Whatever grants were made while the Democratic party was in power that party is responsible for, and we stand ready now to defend them. We do not shrink from the full measure of that responsibility nor seek to share it with others. We do not plead the baby act. We were in power. The Government was in our control. We are not going to prowl through the musty records to see if some one or two or half dozen members of a minority party did not vote as we did, and sheltering ourselves behind a discovery of that sort, cry out, "Shake not thy gory locks at me; thou canst not say I did it." No, sir; we take the responsibility of power when power is given to us by the people. The grants made by the Democratic party prior to 1861 were very different from those made by the Republican party subsequent to 1861. I stand ready to defend those made prior to 1861. Now I ask my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], do you approve and defend the grants made between 1861 and 1874?

Mr. PAYSON. Does the gentleman desire an answer now?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I would be glad to have it now provided my friend does not take too much of my time.

Mr. PAYSON. Under the light of present experience I would not, as a legislator, vote for them. If I had been in Congress in 1862 I have no doubt that, with William R. Morrison and other gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House, I should have voted for those grants under the light which Congress then had.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; not in 1862.

Mr. PAYSON. In 1864, at the time the act amendatory of the Union Pacific act was passed. That was in the summer of 1864, the time Mr. Morrison referred to in the observations which I have had read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Permit me to correct my colleague [Mr. PAYSON]. I do not think he will find that Colonel Morrison ever voted for a railroad land grant.

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, I beg my colleague's pardon. I have in my speech referred to the recorded vote of William R. Morrison. The gentleman will find it in the record, which I can get for him in one minute. Mr. Morrison appears in the list as having voted for the amendatory act——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes; the amendatory act.

Mr. PAYSON. The Union Pacific amendatory act of 1864, in which the land grant and the subsidy were doubled.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I can not yield further. I have no interest in what Mr. Morrison or any other gentleman may have done on this question. That is an individual matter for which the individual alone is responsible. When I speak of the Republican party or the Democratic party I speak of them in the aggregate; I speak of the party as a body, as a political organization, not of what this individual or that may have done.

Now, my friend from Illinois says he would probably have voted for all these grants. Mr. Chairman, if I had been old enough to be in Congress in 1864 and had had the honor of a seat on this floor, I can not conceive of any sort of circumstances, I can not imagine any combination of influences, which could have induced me to cast a vote which would give 47,000,000 acres of the public lands of the United States to a single railroad corporation, as was done in the case of the Northern Pacific.

Mr. LONG. How do you account for the action of Senator Hendricks?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Well, there it is again. My friend propounds the same question already suggested—why did this individual or that cast a particular vote? My friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] called attention to the fact that on some yea-and-nay votes an occasional Republican had voted against these grants and an occasional Democrat had voted for them. I am not speaking about the acts of individuals, but of parties. I do not know what may influence a single individual; I can not discuss that. Mr. Hendricks is a gentleman whose memory I revere, not only because of the position he held in the party to which I am attached, but as well because of his superb abilities and high statesmanship. I am not here to criticise or to discuss his action as an individual. I do not know whether he voted for the Northern Pacific grant or not. If he did, it was exceptional. But however great Senator Hendricks may have been, he never was the Democratic party, any more than my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], who also possesses many of the gentle and noble qualities of the great, is the Republican party.

Mr. LONG. Unfortunately for the Republican party.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Unfortunately for the Republican party. [Laughter.] I am speaking of parties as such in the aggregate, as political organizations.

When I say that a certain Congress in 1864 passed a bill appropriating and donating 47,000,000 acres of our public lands to a single railroad corporation created by that very Congress, and when I look further and find that in that Congress there was an overwhelming Republican majority in both branches, and that the President who approved the act was a Republican, I do not want to inquire any further to see how this or that individual upon either side may have voted. The question of responsibility is fixed and settled.

Mr. PAYSON. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question? Does he desire the House and the country to understand that such a measure as that is a party question simply because it is presented when a particular party is in power, and receives a majority vote of the members of that party?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I wish to be so understood. Whatever legislation of any character, good or bad, is passed by this House in this Congress, the Democratic party is responsible for it. I have heard you gentlemen say that a hundred times during the last six months.

Mr. PAYSON. Is it a party question? We pass private pension bills here every Friday night. Is it a Democratic measure which gives a pension of $8 per month to John Doe or Richard Roe? If the majority in this House votes to build a light-house on the Atlantic or Pacific coast, is that a party question?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I understand that you gentlemen are very much disposed to make pensions party questions on every possible occasion. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman begs the question.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Yes, I say in a broad sense that every piece of legislation of national importance which goes through this Democratic House at this session is legislation for which the Democratic party as such is responsible.

Mr. WEAVER. And if the party in power claims credit for the good things, why should it not be responsible for the bad things?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. It ought to be. My friend from Illinois is trying to evade the responsibility of his party for the bad things.

Mr. PAYSON. Not at all.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, my friend has conceded substantially all I asserted—that after 1861 a very different policy was inaugurated with reference to the disposition of our public lands. He admits that prior to that time all grants were made to the States, to be under the control of the States, to be donated by them to corporations of their own creation and subject to their local legislation; the grants themselves were local, the corporations local, and everything was made subject to State control. He admits that after 1861 Congress went into the business of creating corporations and making enormous land grants directly to them, utterly ignoring the States. Prior to 1861 the grants were to the States; subsequent to 1861 they were to corporations. I can see a very marked difference between a grant to a sovereign State and a grant to a private corporation. I think my friend could see the difference too if he was not intentionally and obstinately blind. Not only did Congress give these private corporations our public lands, but also the bonds of the Government.

Mr. CASWELL. Is it not true that in the former grants, the grants to the States, the beneficiaries were virtually designated?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. The grants made prior to 1861 were made to the States. In the case of the State of Illinois the grant of about 2,500,000 acres was made to the State to aid the State to construct a road across its territory from north to south, and the State granted the lands to a corporation chartered by its own Legislature to build the road and named it the Illinois Central Railroad Company. The grant was made to the State of Illinois to aid that State in the construction of that railroad. I have said that all the time; but I have said there was a marked difference between a grant to a State to aid in the construction of a local enterprise—a grant to the State itself for the construction of a railroad upon which the State itself can impose such conditions as it pleases, where it can direct the methods of construction and operation and surround the corporation with the limitations of its own authority—and——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And the State of Illinois claimed 7 per cent. of the gross earnings of that Illinois Central Railroad.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Yes; I was just about stating that, and that runs indefinitely I believe.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, indefinitely, under which the State gets $500,000 a year.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Thereby paying into the State treasury, as the result of that that 7 per cent. tax on the gross earnings of the Illinois Central Railroad, $500,000 a year.

I say I can see a great difference between an act of that kind and an act creating a private railroad corporation and giving it forty or fifty millions of acres of the public lands.

Mr. PAYSON. Assuming it was a good thing to the people that a trans-continental line of railway should be constructed like the Union Pacific and Central Pacific, how could it be done better than by creating a corporation and granting the aid directly to it? As a practical measure what else could be done?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Those corporations were created ostensibly for the purpose of constructing railroads across the uninhabited prairies of the great West, to establish highways along which emigration might pour its currents, and to open up and develop the resources of the country. The grants of lands were made ostensibly to aid those corporations in that work. But the corporations after receiving the grants, instead of promptly prosecuting the work before them and opening up the country to the uses of civilized life, lay by and waited until the pioneers had gone on in advance, braving the perils of the frontier, and had built towns and cities and established great communities—waited until civilization had unfurled her banners everywhere, subdued the wilderness and filled the air with the music of young and prosperous industries, and then went creeping along the ways beaten by the feet of the multitudes who had gone on in advance and taken possession of the country.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman is criticising the method in which this was done. It is not the case of a grant to a State to aid in the construction of a local enterprise. In all the grants prior to 1861 the enterprises were local and none were interstate, but were in the several States and granted to the States.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. Assuming that it was proper for the Government to aid in the construction of the trans-continental roads, how could the Congress have done it except by making the grants to such corporations?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. That is, assuming that Congress was going to make the grants anyhow?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, assuming it was not to be helped at all, could it have been done in any other way?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I presume it could have been done in some other way.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Southern Pacific grant was the other way.

Mr. PAYSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Southern Pacific in the State of California does not operate a rood of road, and never did, and never assumed to, outside of the State of California. It was in connection with the Texas Pacific along the thirty-second parallel of latitude. The other was from the Needles to San Francisco, and the Atlantic and Pacific runs along the thirty-fifth parallel.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was not this entire grant through the States and Territories?

Mr. PAYSON. Not the grant on the Southern line.

Mr. HOLMAN. I beg your pardon. It was through New Mexico and Arizona to the extent of more than 12,000,000 acres.

Mr. PAYSON. No grant was made to the Territories. Now, I am assuming it could not be made in any other way than by a railroad corporation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, will my friend allow me a moment?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Missouri contends that by the organization of these great corporations they were taken entirely beyond the local Territorial control. They were created by the Federal Government, and were roads leading from one State into or through another, and beyond the mere State control. All grants prior to the act of March 4, 1861, were made to the States for the benefit of local improvements; and these corporations were built up by the States by the grants of land, and were under their jurisdiction and control. The gentleman no doubt well remembers the extraordinary efforts that were made to consolidate the Southern lines—there being a multitude of small corporations—in order to place them beyond the control of the States and beyond the control of their Territorial jurisdiction; and subsequently the Central Pacific was placed under the control of a single corporation created in Kentucky, to carry it as far as possible beyond local State control. So I think there is an important difference, as the gentleman will remember, because prior to March 4, 1861, all these grants for the purpose of constructing railroads were made directly to the States, and were under the control of the States, whereas, since March 4, 1861, the policy has been changed and corporations have been created above and beyond local control, and subject only to Federal authority.

Mr. PAYSON. Now, I am sure the gentleman from Indiana desires to be entirely correct. Let me say this——

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I must decline to yield further. I desire to be courteous, but I must use a part of my time myself.

[At this point, the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the committee rose and the House adjourned. On Monday, July 30, the House again being in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the general deficiency appropriation bill, Mr. STONE, of Missouri, continued as follows:]

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose on Saturday evening I was about to reply to a question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON]. I will read from the notes furnished me by the reporter concerning what was then said:

Mr. PAYSON. Assuming that it was proper for the Government to aid in the construction of the transcontinental roads, how could the Congress have done it except by making the grant to such corporations?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. That is, assuming that Congress was going to make the grants anyhow.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, assuming that it was not to be helped, could it have been done in any other way?

That is to say, the gentleman from Illinois desires to know whether, if it was the settled, fixed, unalterable purpose of Congress to make these enormous donations of the public lands for the purposes for which they were appropriated, any other or better way could have been devised than that which was adopted?

Mr. PAYSON. I know the gentleman does not wish to misstate, so I ask him to permit me to make a suggestion. What I said, or intended to say, was that if the transcontinental roads were to be built and were to be aided by Congress, without saying how much or how little, then, under the necessities of the case, the corporations themselves must be aided directly rather than through the intermediary action of the States and Territories. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. That is substantially what I was attempting to state. His question was, if Congress intended to aid in the construction of these lines of railroads, which the gentleman denominates transcontinental, could any better plan have been devised than to make the donations directly to the corporations themselves? Now that those donations constituted a great public wrong, that they were an outrage upon public right, I think will hardly be controverted in the light of present experience. What the gentleman from Illinois desires to know is if this great wrong was going to be perpetrated anyhow, whether the way in which it was done was not as good a way to do it as any other. Mr. Chairman, if a man standing in a public park of this city should be approached stealthily from behind and have his brains blown out, my friend might ask if that man was going to be murdered anyhow—if it was preordained and predestined that he was to be murdered, and that his assailant was to murder him, whether it was not just as good and expeditious a way to shoot his brains out and kill him as to creep up behind him and thrust a dagger between his ribs or strike him on the head with a bludgeon, or kill him in some other way?

Possibly it would make no difference; but none the less the homicide would be a crime whether it was done one way or the other. If some sneak-thief has determined to steal my watch, it matters not to me, so far as the property is concerned, whether he snatches it from my pocket or steals into my bedroom and slips it from beneath my pillow. But whether the theft be accompanied with robbery or with burglary it is still theft; the thing itself is wrong. I think my friend can properly apply the parallels I have drawn. The creation of these corporations and the granting to them of these vast areas of public lands was a thinly disguised public crime; the thing itself was an outrage, a public wrong, a shameless prostitution of the powers of Congress. Still, if Congress was determined to do this great wrong, perhaps it did not and does not make any difference whether it was committed in one way or another.

But I will endeavor to be more direct in my reply to the gentleman's question. If Congress had determined to do it—if, in the language of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], it could not be helped; if those railroad lines were bound to receive public aid, it seems to me it would have been infinitely better to have taken the money necessary for the construction of the lines out of the public Treasury, built the roads, and turned them over as a free gift to the several companies, than to have taken these millions of acres of the public lands, the homes of future generations, and created them into great private landed estates in the dead hands of pitiless corporations. That would have been a better way, if, indeed, it was absolutely necessary that the property of the people should be absorbed in those enterprises.

But if, in the language of Dr. Lipscomb, a noted character in my district, Congress was "hell-bent and predetermined" on using the public lands for this purpose, then I say it would have been infinitely better to have donated the lands to the States and Territories through which the several lines of road were projected; to have put the lands in the hands of the States and made them subject to their control, so that gentlemen who desired franchises to build the roads would have been compelled to go to the Legislatures and local authorities of the States and Territories to obtain them. That would have been better than coming to Congress—better for the country, if not for the schemers. Congress had no business to embark in such enterprises.

It is said that the roads run through more than one State. Suppose they do. The Northern Pacific passes through the State of Minnesota, for instance. Why could not that portion of the lands granted to that corporation which lie in the State of Minnesota have been given to that State? Why not that portion in the State of Oregon to that State? Why not have made all the grants to the States and Territories through which these various roads were to run? The lands could have been given to the States and Territories, and those desiring to build the roads could have been sent to deal with the local authorities, and the local authorities could have imposed such conditions and limitations as might have subserved and conserved the public right and interest.

But, Mr. Chairman, I return from this diversion. I have been led entirely away from the straight line of my purpose by interruptions. My friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] on Saturday, while this appropriation bill was under consideration, rose to deliver his carefully prepared speech in response to speeches made upon this side of the House three weeks ago, during the discussion of the forfeiture bill, in which discussion the gentleman himself then participated. He was not satisfied to leave the discussion where it stood. I suppose after prayerful reflection my friend and his party associates have felt the embarrassing necessity of further explaining in some way the unfortunate attitude of the Republican party with reference to the acquisition, control, and disposition of our public lands. The gentleman from Illinois, as a distinguished member on that side of the House, has been put forward to do what he can to allay a justly aroused and indignant public sentiment upon this subject.

I repeat, what the gentleman in his written speech controverted, but what I think he has now practically admitted, that when the Republican party came into power in 1861 a wide and radical departure from the methods which had previously prevailed was inaugurated. The policy of making grants to the States to be under their control, to be disposed of by them to aid in the prosecution of their own enterprises, was abandoned. Under the old régime, if corporations received any land at all, they received it from the States; the corporations were the creatures of the States; their charters could be forfeited by State authority if the local laws were not observed; the States could impose any conditions they pleased.

In the case of the Illinois Central the grant was made by the Legislature to aid in the construction of the railroad, and the company was hedged in by many salutary restrictions and had important obligations imposed upon it—among others that it should annually pay a certain per cent. of its gross earnings into the State treasury. My friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has stated, what I suppose is generally known, that as a result of that legislation that company pays into the treasury of that State every year the sum of $500,000, which, I understand, is appropriated for the purpose of educating the children of the State.

That was the Democratic method and the method of all parties prior to 1861. After 1861, upon the accession of the Republican party to power, the States were ignored; the local authorities were forgotten or put aside; great corporations were created here by Congressional enactment; and areas of the public lands, larger in extent than many of the greatest empires of the world, granted directly to them. Wealthy, distinguished, and influential gentlemen came down to Congress and asked that they be incorporated under various names—the Northern Pacific, the Union Pacific, the Texas Pacific, etc.—that they be authorized to construct roads through the States and Territories, and that grants of the public lands be made to them. Whatever they asked they received.

The corporations were created and the grants made. Now, these corporations thus created owe no allegiance to the States. When suits are brought against them in any State they spurn the local courts and appeal to the Federal judiciary. They are not subject to the restraints of local authority, except in a very modified degree. No restrictions or limitations, or comparatively none, can be imposed upon them by State legislation. They assume to be in a large measure independent of the States, if not above them. That is the result of the policy adopted subsequent to 1861. I say it was a remarkable and radical departure from that which had prevailed previous to that period. Under the old policy the railroad belonged to the State; under the new, the State belongs to the railroad.

If I had time I would be glad to trace somewhat in extenso the history of this land-grant legislation. I had intended to do so, but I have not time to do it. I had intended in that connection to quote somewhat from a speech delivered a year or two ago by my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

By the act of Congress in 1864, twelve gentlemen and their unnamed associates were constituted a corporation under the style of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. To this corporation 47,000,000 acres of the public lands in the magnificent States and Territories of the Northwest were granted. Those gentlemen never paid a solitary dollar into the treasury of the corporation. They divided the stock among themselves, but paid nothing for it. Only one assessment was ever made upon the stock of the stockholders. There was one assessment on each of $12,500. For what? Not to go into the treasury of the company to be used in constructing the railroad, but to be used in procuring additional legislation from Congress. What additional legislation? Under the original act of 1864 work on the road was to be begun within two years thereafter. So much work was to be done each year, and the whole road was to be completed by July 4, 1876; and the original act did not confer any authority to mortgage the lands until they were earned by the construction of the road.

Now 1868 had come and no work whatever had been done on the road. The grant then stood as forfeited by a failure of the company to begin work in accordance with the conditions of the grant. The additional legislation desired was an act extending the time for the commencement and completion of the work, and an act to authorize the company to mortgage the lands which had been granted to it. They came down to Congress after making this $12,500 assessment and secured the legislation they desired. The time for construction was extended from 1876 to 1879, and the right to mortgage the lands was granted to them by joint resolution in 1870. During all this time not the fractional part of a dollar had been expended in the construction or even looking toward the construction of the road.

These twelve gentlemen, beginning with J. Gregory Smith and ending with J. Edgar Thomson—Thomson without a "p"—and the same, I presume, of sweet and precious memory, whose name is associated with that great philanthropic and eleemosynary institution the Edgar Thomson Steel Works at Pittsburgh, an institution which a few weeks since was striving to reduce the wages of its operatives to a basis near the verge of starvation, while its chief officer, as he has himself confessed, draws $1,500,000 per year out of the business, and who is now pleasure riding with Mr. Blaine through the lowlands of England and the highlands of Scotland, recuperating their energies for another great struggle for protection against the "pauper labor of Europe"—these twelve gentlemen came here to the doors of Congress, knocked, and it was opened unto them, asked and it was given to them.

But I can not go further into that; my time will not permit. Such were the methods prior to 1861 and such the methods subsequent to 1861. Now, I want to call attention to a few general facts. The total grants made to the States from 1789 to 1861 were 36,029,674 acres. About 26,000,000 acres of those grants were made during Democratic administrations, and the remainder under Whig administrations. From 1861 to 1874, while the Republican party was master of the situation in Congress and out of it, while it had undisputed control of the executive, judicial, and legislative departments of the Government, there were granted in thirteen years 185,218,966 acres of the public lands.

There is a difference of 149,189,292 acres. In other words, in thirteen years under Republican domination and control there were granted 149,189,292 acres of land more than had been granted during the whole previous eighty years of our history.

Let me call the attention of the House to some of the lavish donations of our public lands which were made by that party. On the 1st day of July, 1862—now this is one day, remember—there was granted to the Union Pacific Railroad Company at one dab 12,000,000 acres, and on the same day 6,000,000 to the Denver and Kansas Pacific Railroads, making a total of 18,000,000 acres in one day.

Mr. HOLMAN. More than that.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. No, that was all on that day.

Mr. HOLMAN. Were there not two other grants; the Central Pacific——

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Yes, but I am speaking of this one day. On July 2, 1864, 9,000,000 acres were granted to the Central Pacific and Western, and on the same day, to the Hannibal and St. Joseph, and the Sioux City and Pacific, and the Burlington and Missouri River roads, 3,282,544 acres; and on the same day, to the Northern Pacific, 47,000,000, making 59,282,544 acres granted in a single day. That is a pretty good day's work. On July 27, 1866, there was granted to the Atlantic and Pacific 42,000,000 acres, and on the same day, to the Southern Pacific, 9,520,000 acres, making a total of 51,520,000 acres. That was another pretty good day's work. Again, on March 3, 1871, there was granted to a branch line of the Southern Pacific 3,520,000 acres, and to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg 3,800,000 acres, and to the Texas and Pacific 18,000,000 acres, making a grand total of 25,320,000 acres granted on that day. That also was a good day's work. At least it was a fair average day's work. [Laughter.] And so, Mr. Chairman, I might go on through with the list. These vast grants were made until the total has aggregated 185,218,966 acres of our public domain.

Mr. Chairman, I have a book here, from which I wish to read just a little. It is a recent well-considered work by Dr. Strong.

It has been shown that we have room for at least a thousand millions. According to recent figures there is in France a population of 180.88 to the square mile; in Germany, 216.62; in England and Wales, 428.67; in Belgium, 481.71; in the United States, not including Alaska, 16.88. If our population were as dense as that of France we should have, this side of Alaska, 537,000,000; if as dense as that of Germany, 643,000,000; if as dense as that of England and Wales, 1,173,000,000; if as dense as that of Belgium, 1,430,000,000.

Of the twenty-two States and Territories west of the Mississippi only three are as small as all New England. Montana would stretch from Boston on the east to Cleveland on the West, and extend far enough south to include Richmond, Va. Idaho, if laid down in the East, would touch Toronto, Canada, on the north, and Raleigh, N. C., on the south, while its southern boundary line is long enough to stretch from Washington City to Columbus, Ohio; and California, if on our Atlantic seaboard, would extend from the southern line of Massachusetts to the lower part of South Carolina; or, in Europe, it would extend from London across France and well into Spain. New Mexico is larger than the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The greatest measurement of Texas is nearly equal to the distance from New Orleans to Chicago, or from Chicago to Boston. Lay Texas on the face of Europe, and this giant, with its head resting on the mountains of Norway (directly east of the Orkney Islands), with one palm covering London, the other Warsaw, would stretch himself down across the kingdom of Denmark, across the empires of Germany and Austria, across Northern Italy, and lave his feet in the Mediterranean. Dakota might be carved into a half-dozen kingdoms of Greece; or, if it were divided into twenty-six equal counties, we might lay down the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel in each.

Place the 50,000,000 inhabitants of the United States in 1880 all in Texas, and the population would not be as dense as that of Germany. Put them in Dakota, and the population would not be as dense as that of England and Wales. Place them in New Mexico, and the density of population would not be as great as that of Belgium. Those 50,000,000 might all be comfortably sustained in Texas. After allowing, say 50,000 square miles for "desert," Texas could have produced all our food crops in 1879—grown, as we have seen, on 164,215 square miles of land—could have raised the world's supply of cotton, 12,000,000 bales, at 1 bale to the acre, on 19,000 square miles, and then have had remaining, for a cattle range, a territory larger than the State of New York.

Texas has an area of 170,099,200 acres; Dakota has 95,424,000 acres; New Mexico, 78,451,200 acres. In either of those Territories, or in the State of Texas, we could put the entire population of the United States, according to the census of 1880, and it would not be as dense as it is in some of the leading countries of Europe. The German Empire has a population of 46,852,450 people, but the empire contains only 133,519,360 acres of land, or 36,579,840 acres less than is contained in the State of Texas.

France has 130,579,200 acres of land, supporting a population of 38,218,903; Great Britain and Ireland have an acreage of 77,805,440, and a total population of 35,246,633.

What a magnificent empire Texas is. Its extent, resources, and capabilities are well described in the work from which I have read. It is capable of supporting the entire population of the United States, yet in thirteen years the Republican party gave away a territory embracing 15,119,776 acres more than is embraced in that wonderful State. The combined populations of Great Britain, Ireland, and France aggregate 73,465,536 human beings; the combined acreage area is 208,384,640 acres, or only 23,165,674 acres in excess of the grants made by the Republican party between 1861 and 1874.

Great Britain and Ireland and the German Empire have a combined population of 82,099,083, and a combined area of 211,324,800 acres. Over 82,000,000 of people, comprising the two greatest empires of Europe, with all their centuries of history and civilization, have within their territorial limits only 26,105,834 acres more than were granted to these railroad corporations during thirteen years of Republican supremacy. In thirteen years we gave away to these railroads a territory capable of sustaining about 80,000,000 of human beings.

I wish I had time to pursue this view of this important and all-absorbing question. But I have not, for I must say a word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois as to what has been done in the way of reclaiming these lands.

My friend from Illinois said that the Republican party was as much entitled to credit for what has been done in that regard as the Democratic party. I wonder if he really believes that. He certainly remembers the Forty-seventh Congress. He was a member of it. It was a Republican Congress, both Senate and House. Mr. Keifer, of Ohio, was Speaker. The Judiciary Committee, of which the gentleman himself was a member, was presided over by Mr. REED, of Maine, the leader of the Republicans in this House. The first forfeiture bill ever introduced in Congress was introduced in the House during that Congress, and was referred to the Judiciary Committee. That was a bill to forfeit and restore to the people this very Northern Pacific grant. The Republican majority of that committee, through Mr. REED, reported the bill back to the House with a recommendation that it do not pass, while the Democratic minority of that committee favored its passage. The bill was never heard of after the reports were made.

The House in the two succeeding Congresses, the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth, was Democratic. During those two Congresses a large number of forfeiture bills were introduced in the House and referred by Speaker CARLISLE to the Committee on the Public Lands and were promptly reported with a recommendation that they pass. They did pass the House, and a part of them passed the Senate, though the Senate pigeon-holed the most of them. It has been almost impossible to get forfeiture bills through that body. The gentleman knows that well enough, and has frequently said so. However, I need not have gone back of the present Congress to illustrate the difference between the two parties with reference to the reclamation of these lands. I might have taken the vote upon the forfeiture bill which was before the House only three weeks ago, and rested my whole case upon that. There were three propositions before the House, one to forfeit 78,000,000 acres, one to forfeit 54,000,000 acres, and one to forfeit 5,000,000 acres. The latter was the Senate proposition and had the support of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Republican proposition, mark you, was to close up this business by passing a bill to forfeit only about 5,000,000 acres of these granted lands. On that proposition the Republicans in both House and Senate were practically united. Out of the 153 Republican members of this House only 17 voted against it; but only 14 Democrats out of the 168 Democratic members of the House voted with the gentleman from Illinois in favor of that proposition. On the proposition to forfeit the largest amount, 78,000,000 acres, only 6 Republicans voted in favor of it. Nearly all the votes in favor of the measure were given by Democrats.

We passed the forfeiture bill here and returned it to the Senate, and that body insists on the forfeiture of only 5,000,000 of acres. My friend says that politics have nothing to do with all this. May be not. Mr. Chairman, we have just finished an interesting and extended debate on the tariff. It has attracted public attention in a remarkable degree. We have also just passed a tariff bill—a bill to reduce taxation. I look down a few years into the future and I fancy I can now see the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], and others who have led the debates in this House for a prohibitory tariff, standing up in the aisles of the House and repeating what I may properly designate the "Payson act."

Looking about them and beholding the blessing that will flow out to the country and to the people from the achievements of the Democratic party; with the grasp of monopoly released from the industries of the country and its hand withered and nerveless; with new life and new energy pervading all our industries whether on the farm, in the factory, or in the mine; with our merchant navy restored to its supremacy on the seas and carrying the commerce of the world; with all these promised blessings realized and with a prosperous, happy, and contented people, I expect to see these distinguished gentleman, who but yesterday were clamoring against any reduction of the burdens which oppress the people and the business of the country, standing up here in imitation of the gentleman from Illinois, and swearing there never was anything remotely akin to politics in the tariff. They will protest that the tariff is, and always has been, a purely economic question, and that Senators and Representatives have voted on it without reference to party lines.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITCH], and two or three other Republicans who supported the Mills bill will be pointed out as bright and shining examples of Republican tariff reformers. On the other hand, we will be reminded that no less an individual than Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, and two or three other Democrats scarcely less distinguished, opposed the passage of the Mills bill. With such imposing facts we will be overwhelmed, and any credit we may claim for originating and enacting tariff legislation will be put to shame. Sir, there will be just as much reason for that contention, and it can be made with just as much propriety, as the claim here now put forward by the gentleman from Illinois that party politics had nothing to do with the land grants made during the days of Republican supremacy, nor with the reclamation of the lands during the later days of Democratic supremacy. In each instance the contention will rest upon the fact that some stray Democrat occasionally voted with the Republicans, and in like manner a stray Republican occasionally voted with the Democrats.

Mr. Chairman, it is pitiful that a great party should be brought to this desperate end. I like a brave man. I hate to see a grown man, or a party of grown men, running away from their own work, disowning their own progeny, and resorting to subterfuges to escape or to divide responsibility. A party that has courage enough to do a thing should have courage enough to face the responsibility of its work and to assume it. I close with insisting upon that much at least, in the name of American manhood. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally to receive a message from the Senate.

A message from the Senate by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate requested the House to return to the Senate the bill (S. 907) to provide for the erection of a public building at Charlotte, N. C.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] desires to occupy five of the ten minutes assigned to me, I will cheerfully yield them to him.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I thank the gentleman. I do not care to speak further.

Mr. PAYSON. I shall occupy only a few minutes, sir, in answering the points made by the gentleman from Missouri. I am not to be diverted, in what I say now, from the line of argument which I presented to the committee on Saturday, which was an attempt on my part to show that action in the earlier days of the history of this legislation was not only not regarded as distinctively partisan, but that members divided with reference to it on economic lines, and that the same rule obtained as to the later grants of public lands made in aid of the transcontinental roads. That was my sole purpose, and is now. But I take a single moment to say that when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] asked me on Saturday whether or not, had I been a member of Congress in 1862, I would have voted for the great grant made to the Union Pacific road, and I answered him by saying, "In the light of present experience perhaps not; in the light of what they were then experiencing who had charge of public affairs doubtless I would," I meant that answer to be understood in its broadest sense.

I need not do more than again call the attention of this House and the country to what was said by Mr. Morrison in the Forty-ninth Congress, he then occupying the position of leadership on the Democratic side of the House as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, when he recounted briefly but vividly the position of affairs when Congress was called to act on these questions. I can only call attention to his remarks quoted by me on Saturday. It was believed, Mr. Chairman, at that time by almost every one in public life that the building of a trans-continental line of road was a necessary factor in the preservation of the Union. That assertion made at that time by those in public life was never disputed; and when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is pleased to say that he can conceive of no situation, of no state or condition of affairs in this country that would impel him to vote for a grant of public lands in aid of the Union Pacific road, it may be that the preservation of this Union was not as dear to him in 1862, as it was to the men who then represented the great and the loyal North. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] Men who stood here voting away public lands, with a prodigality that now subjects them to criticism, to an enterprise that to them seemed vital as a war measure, should be judged in the light of the experience which they were then undergoing, and not by the reasoning that grows out of twenty years' retrospection. The knowledge that comes after the fact is worthless outside of any motive which actuates legislators in the performance of their duty. I would have voted for that act in that light.

Why, sir, in this very Chamber and from the White House, calls were being made for the best manhood and blood of the nation to effectuate the perpetuation of the Union. At that very date, sir, the prospects of the Confederacy were brightening. Only a few weeks later the sound of rebel artillery was plainly heard at the capital, and, indeed, even then the rebel soldiery were crowding alarmingly near the Chambers where Congress was deliberating.

California and the Pacific Slope must be saved to us, and it was believed this would do it and this alone; and shall it be said as against men who were willing then as legislators to call, and who are justified now in having called, for the expenditure of thousands of millions of treasure and hundreds of thousands of lives for that purpose, that they are to be criticised for the performance of the simple act of tying the Pacific coast to the North and to the East by bands of iron?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. PAYSON. With pleasure.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I understand that you justify these donations and grants upon the ground that they were necessary for the preservation of the Union?

Mr. PAYSON. Upon the ground that they were believed to be necessary by those who made them.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Now, is it not true that the largest grants were made in 1864, when the war was nearly done, and that the right to mortgage those 47,000,000 acres of land and steal them was granted in 1869, long after the war was over.

Mr. PAYSON. I am coming to that. I beg the gentleman not to anticipate me. But he is not accurate where accuracy is essential.

It is true that the greater grants and privileges were given to the Union Pacific by the act of 1864, as I said on Saturday, because the offers made in 1862 did not attract capital to the enterprise and it failed to start.

Then came the grant of 1864, so fiercely denounced. Was the war then believed to be nearly over? I beg the gentleman to remember that it was in this year that the party to which the gentleman belongs was "denouncing the war as a failure," and it was dark enough at the North. And the gentleman is again in error in asserting that the power to mortgage was given in 1869; it was given in this same act of 1864, and by that act its mortgage was made paramount to the Government lien for the subsidy bonds. This was all in 1864.

I am now trying to make perfectly clear the grounds of the answer which I made to the gentleman on Saturday, that had I been a member of Congress in 1862 with the light we then had I would have voted for the grant then made. I am on that point now.

I will say frankly that had I been a member of Congress when the other several acts passed I would not have voted for the Northern Pacific grants; I would not have voted for the Texas Pacific grant; I would not have voted for the Atlantic and Pacific grant. But, Mr. Chairman, that is simply my own idea as to the proper policy, and I am not questioning the motives of others who did vote for those grants.

Now, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] says that he knows a better way of aiding the transcontinental lines than by granting the lands directly to the corporations. He says that his policy would have been to have made the grants to the States and Territories through which the roads were to pass, and to have had those States and Territories stand as trustees, that whatever grants were made to the trans-continental lines should have been placed under the control and direction of the States and Territories, if any such grants were made at all.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I think they ought not to have been made at all.

Mr. PAYSON. I understand that. The gentleman says they ought not to have been made at all, but that if they were made they ought to have been made in that way. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is so easy for the gentleman to be mistaken as to the policy they would have pursued in a given case had they instead of others been called upon to act! I hold in my hand a list of the different Territories of the Union showing the dates when they were organized, and the record shows that at the time the first of these transcontinental lines was projected four of the Territories through which they run had no existence; and the great area of country through which those lines were to be constructed in order to tie the East and the North to the Pacific coast on the West was a vast unbroken wilderness, with no political organization whatever.

Who would have been the grantee, I ask the gentleman from Missouri, in the aid which was made to the lines of road traversing Dakota, Montano, Wyoming, Idaho, and Arizona when at the time the question was first agitated no such Territories were in existence or hardly contemplated? Is anything more than this statement required to demonstrate beyond the possibility of question that, conceding that these roads should have been aided (and it was not my purpose to discuss that question one way or the other), conceding that the roads should have been built, the aid could not have been given in any other way? That is all there is of it. The gentleman takes an abundance of time to argue against the policy of the Northern Pacific grant, and quotes from a speech of mine made two years ago on that subject. I stand by that now; but I am not to be diverted from the point of this debate, which is distinctive party responsibility upon the Republican party for the policy of grants in aid of railroads and credit claimed by the Democrats for all accomplished forfeitures. I hear but little from the gentleman on this now.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will allow me one question?

Mr. PAYSON. With pleasure, always.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is he not aware of the fact that when the act of 1864, in regard to the Union Pacific road was passed, it was abundantly shown and perfectly well understood at the time that the grant in bonds alone was ample for the construction of the road from some point on the Missouri to the Pacific coast. Mr. E. B. Washburne, of the State of Illinois, who bitterly opposed the measure, charged over and over again that the land grant which was enlarged by the act of 1864 was a mere naked gratuity, as the grant of bonds was more than sufficient to construct the road.

Mr. PAYSON. Of course, Mr. Chairman; but that only bears on the propriety of the aid proposed, and that proves what I have charged, that men did not divide on party lines.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman finds of course here and there a Democrat voting for the amendatory act; but of the Democrats still in public life does he find any who gave support to that measure of 1864?

Mr. PAYSON. Do I find any gentlemen who supported it who are now Democrats in public life? Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana when did Senator VOORHEES, of Indiana, ever fail to uphold the banner of the Democracy upon every question of party politics? And did he not support and vote for the land grant to the Northern Pacific road?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think my friend will find only one or two Democratic votes.

Mr. PAYSON. Only one or two! Well, "the baby was a very little one," and therefore no charge ought to be made in regard to it. [Laughter.] Another Democrat who voted in the same way was Senator BECK, of Kentucky; another, Mr. Coffroth, of Pennsylvania; another, Mr. Eden, of my own State, who served here long with the gentleman from Indiana; Mr. Allen, of Illinois, was another. I could name more than you have fingers and toes, and then double the list, of prominent Democrats who urged the policy, propriety, and necessity of this grant of land.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no; I think you have named all there were.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I will give the list of the members of the gentleman's party so voting, and see who were supporting the measure now so roundly denounced for capital. Many of these gentlemen I know; the rest are vouched for as Democrats.

The Union Pacific bill passed the Senate on June 20, 1862, by a vote of 35 to 5, such Democrats as Cowan, Davis, Kennedy, Lane of Indiana, Latham, McDougal, Nesmith, Rice, Stark, Willey, and Wilson of Missouri voting ay, and only 5 against, namely, Howe, King, and Wilkinson, Republicans, and Pierce and Wright, Democrats.

In the House the Democrats who voted for the bill were Messrs. Allen, Biddle, Brown, Clements, Corning, Delaplaine, Edgerton, Haight, Hall, Leary, Menzies, Noell, Perry, Price, Rollins of Missouri, Steele, Ward, and Webster; while the Union Pacific amendatory act of 1864 was voted for and supported by the following Democrats:

Messrs. Baldwin, Brooks of New York, Coffroth, English of Connecticut, Kalbfleisch of New York, Julian, Knox of Missouri, Morrison of Illinois, Meyers, Odell of New York, Ross of Indiana, J. B. Steele, W. G. Steele, and Sweat.

The Northern Pacific grant bill was supported and voted for by the following Democrats: Allen of Illinois, Baldwin of Missouri, Boyd, Coffroth, Eden of Illinois, Eldridge of Wisconsin, Hall, King, Knapp, Lazier, McAllister, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Pruyn, J. B. Steele, W. G. Steele, Sweat, VOORHEES of Indiana, and Ward.

Senator Hendricks was an earnest supporter of the bill by voice and vote.

I call my friend's attention to what I said on Saturday.

I come to the Texas Pacific system. After full debate it passed the Senate without a division—not a Democrat voting against it. In the House the vote was taken first February 21, 1871, amending the Senate bill, and it going to a conference committee, the bill as reported passed March 3, 1871, by a vote of 125 to 64, receiving the following Democratic support and vote: Messrs. Archer, Axtell, BECK of Kentucky, Bethune, Booker, Buck, Connor, Corker, Dockery, Dox, Duke, Hambleton, Hamill, Hamilton, Heflin, Johnson, Jones, Manning, McKenzie, John Morrisey, Mungen, Meyers, W. W. Caine, Schumaker, Shober, J. S. Smith, Strader, Swann, Trimble of Kentucky, Wallace, Wilson, and Young—33.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will see there is a goodly list of the "Simon pure" "standing for iniquity," viewed from this day of light; but, sir, from it all the point I make is that these measures were never regarded as distinctively party questions.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend would relieve his party from the responsibility of those measures.

Mr. PAYSON. And at the same time while I relieve my own party from responsibility I help out of difficulty substantially an equal number of distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The time allowed for general debate at this time has expired. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill, read the following:

For post-office at Minneapolis, Minn.: For approaches complete and for an additional elevator, $11,500.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move to amend by inserting, after line 3, on page 7, the following:

For custom-house and post-office at Port Townsend, Wash., for completion, $120,000.

Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the House, I desire briefly to state the importance of a favorable consideration of this amendment. I have here a letter from the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, dated June 13, 1888, from which it will appear that the proposition I now submit is second in importance to no measure embraced within the scope of this bill. The Supervising Architect says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Washington, June 13, 1888.

SIR: Referring to our conversation of this morning, I have the honor to state that Congress has appropriated $120,000 for the construction of the custom-house at Port Townsend, Wash., and limited cost to the amount of appropriation.

By reference to resolutions passed by the Board of Trade of Port Townsend—

And I will state here that I have verified these statistics by a very careful examination, and can state upon my personal responsibility that the results arrived at by the Board of Trade at Port Townsend are entirely correct—

I find that the limit placed will be insufficient to secure the needed accommodations for the transaction of the Federal business, for the reasons:

First. That this port stands first in the number of American steam-vessels engaged in foreign trade.

Second. That it stands second in the tonnage of American steam-vessels engaged in foreign trade, New York being first.

Third. That the collections of this district have increased from $79,000 for the fiscal year of 1886 to about $250,000 for the fiscal year of 1887, as approximately estimated by the collector of customs.

Fourth. That the number of employés in this district is double the number employed at the time the original bill passed in 1884.

It is apparent therefore, from a full consideration of the subject, that the limit of the cost of the building should be extended from $120,000 to $240,000.

Respectfully, yours,

WILL A. FRERET,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. C. S. VOORHEES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Let me refer briefly to the history of the appropriations for this public building. The original appropriation, which passed in February, 1885, was $70,000. Subsequently an additional appropriation of $12,000 was made for approaches and for heating apparatus. Still later, in the urgency deficiency bill of last winter, an additional appropriation of $38,000 was made, raising the limit to $120,000.

Since that time the Supervising Architect, after consultation with me, has suspended all building operations. There has not been a stroke of work done since the appropriation of $38,000 was made, and for sometime prior thereto. I hold in my hand a letter from the Supervising Architect, the substance of which communicates the fact that a further continuance of the work under the present plan, with the limit at $120,000, will not only not be in the line of public economy, but will involve a decided misapplication of the $120,000, since it appears from all the information obtainable that the superficial area of floor space in the building as at present designed is not as great as the superficial area of floor space in the rented building at present occupied by the customs department, and which affords no space whatever for the post-office or for the United States courts.

On the 18th of July the Supervising Architect addressed me this communication:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
Washington, July 18, 1888.

SIR: In addition to my letter of the 13th ultimo with reference to the United States custom-house at Port Townsend, Wash., I desire to supplement the statement therein contained by calling your attention to the fact that all building operations have been suspended for the reason that the appropriation is not sufficient to provide the necessary accommodations for the public requirements in that city. My previous recommendation that the limit of the cost of the building should be extended from $120,000 to $240,000 is again renewed. This amount is based upon a computation requiring the requisite amount of floor space which the present appropriation and limit can not supply.

Respectfully, yours,

WILL A. FRERET,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. C. S. VOORHEES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would like to have a few minutes longer.

Mr. ROGERS. If the Chair will recognize me I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I think, if the gentleman will allow me, when the chairman of the committee fails to make the point of order upon the proposition it occurs to me that it pretty well settles the question. There is no necessity to make a fight about it.

Mr. BURNES. I think it likely——

Mr. VOORHEES. I am very sure that I do not desire an extension of time for the purpose of precipitating a fight.

Mr. BURNES. The Committee on Appropriations have considered the matter——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inquire if there is objection to permitting the gentleman from Washington Territory to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. VOORHEES. I very gladly yield to the chairman of the committee. He will no doubt state to the House such additional facts as I would state should I go on.

Mr. BURNES. The Committee on Appropriations, after a full hearing of the merits of this proposition, instructed the gentleman in charge of this bill, being impressed favorably with the showing made by the Delegate from Washington Territory, to interpose no point of order, and so my friend and colleague from Illinois can not shake his gory locks at me and say it was I who did it.

Mr. CANNON. I am not at all criticising the gentleman from Missouri, but simply desired to say to my friend from Washington, in view of the fact that no point of order was made upon the bill by any member of the committee or by all of the committee, that having failed to make the point of order, it occurred to me there was no necessity for an extended and elaborate debate in favor of the proposition, which was virtually conceded.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understood the gentleman was simply actuated by a spirit of kindness on his part towards me.

Mr. SAYERS. We did not consider it so over here.

Mr. BURNES. Not at all. But be that as it may, the Committee on Appropriations were unable to see any want of merit in the proposition. It seems to come from an important city, and a growing Territory. The business is increasing very rapidly, and the case came to us so absolutely strong, as presented by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. VOORHEES] that we felt the proposition ought to be considered upon its merits.

The committee instructed me, therefore, to interpose no point of order and leave the decision of the question to the House or to the Committee of the Whole as to whether on the merits it should be adopted. And I, for one, will say frankly, Mr. Chairman, that although prohibited from making this a part of the bill under the rules of the House, yet on the merits of the proposition I am decidedly in favor of the amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON. It occurs to me that nobody on either side says nay.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

District of Columbia:

For the redemption of one certificate of indebtedness issued by authority of section 7 of the act of the Legislative Assembly, approved June 26, 1873, dated July 1, 1873, of the denomination of $50, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, numbered 1371, payable July 1, 1874, $110.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I send an amendment to the desk to come in at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 5 insert:

"For salaries of three matrons for police stations at $600 each; for accommodations of matrons of police stations, $3,200, or so much thereof as may be necessary; in all $9,000, being for the service of the fiscal year 188-."

Mr. BURNES. I will suggest to the gentleman that the amount "$9,000" should be changed now to conform to the other portions of the amendment.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Yes; that should be $5,000, and I modify the amendment in that way.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of judgments: For the payment of judgments against the District of Columbia as follows:

* * * * * * *

James Stewart, $50, together with $3.20 costs.

Mr. BURNES. I send an amendment to the desk to come in on page 12, after line 22.

The Clerk read as follows:

Louisa Hilton and Mary Hilton, $762.50, together with $90.40 costs. Margaret and Catharine Harrigan $500, together with $46.50 costs; and in lines 24 and 25, strike out $7,846.06 and insert in lieu thereof "$9,245.46."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 17, page 17, insert:

"To enable the Secretary of War to pay a reasonable additional compensation to the employés in the office of the Surgeon-General who were actually employed after office hours in disposing of accumulated pension work during the fiscal year 1887, at such rates as he may deem just and proper, but not exceeding 60 cents per hour to clerks (regardless of grade) and not exceeding 30 cents per hour to messengers, for the extra time actually employed, $13,429.20."

Mr. BACON. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of War to complete the monument at Washington's headquarters at Newburgh, N. Y., and of the statues thereon according to the plans adopted by the joint select committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, under the joint resolution of the two Houses, and for gates therein according to the recommendations of the Secretary of War contained in Executive Document 336, Fiftieth Congress, first session, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $32,000.

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNES. There is no law authorizing the appropriation. It is in violation of Rule XXI.

Mr. BACON. I desire to be heard on that point. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state to the Chair what I suppose to be the condition of the law in regard to this matter. Many years ago, sir, the Congress of the United States adopted a joint resolution that there should be erected at this particular place, being the headquarters of Washington's army and the point where they disbanded, a temple of victory. The matter remained in abeyance until in the Forty-eighth Congress, as I recollect, when my predecessor offered a resolution, which was adopted, providing for the erection of the temple of victory in accordance with the former act of Congress, and providing that it should be erected under plans to be adopted by a joint commission to be assigned to that duty, and further provided that $25,000 should be then appropriated to commence the work.

The two Houses by their joint committees adopted plans and specifications for the erection of this monument, and the House subsequently, by a resolution, directed the expenditure of the money under the control of the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War and the Executive Department had nothing to do with the plans and specifications that were adopted by the joint committee of both Houses of Congress for the erection of this monument, and proceeded to make the expenditure under these plans and specifications. The Secretary of War has reported to the House, in reply to a resolution of inquiry passed by the House, that it will take $32,000 to complete the monument in accordance with the plans Congress has adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the law fix the amount that shall be used?

Mr. BACON. It did not limit the amount. It appropriated $25,000, but did not limit it to that.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will continue the reading and the Chair will examine the act previous to ruling on the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Signal Service:

For transportation of men and their baggage, and for transportation of material, being for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, $255.92.

For Signal Service transportation, 1884 and prior years: To pay the claim of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company for, $3.01.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, line 7, add the following:

"For medical attendance and medicines for officers and enlisted men in the Signal Service, being for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, $248.03."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Quartermaster's Department:

Extension of military reservation at Fort Thornburgh, Utah: For payment for private property taken by the Government in extension of the military reservation at Fort Thornburgh, Utah, under the order of the commander of the post, of April 5, 1882, and the President's order of May 13, 1882, being the amount awarded by a board of officers June 10, 1882, as per their report approved by the War Department, $3,437.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, after line 1, insert:

"For payment on account of Army transportation in 1882 and prior years unpaid by Congress and certified to by the accounting officers of the Treasury in House Executive Document 19, Fiftieth Congress, namely: to the Hoboken Land Improvement Company, of New Jersey, $15,800."

Mr. MCADOO. The merits of this matter have been so often discussed by myself and the chairman of the committee and by the House that unless gentlemen desire to raise objection I do not think it will be necessary to make an extensive argument as to the justice of this claim. Suffice it to say that it is the only claim of this kind allowed by the Treasury Department, all other claims being rejected.

Mr. BURNES. As the subject-matter of this claim has been several times before this House and has frequently been discussed at great length, I have noticed an evident disposition on the part of the House to make this allowance. It has been certified to by the accounting officers of the Treasury and by no less a one than the present Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. I can not say that my opinion has undergone any change. The Government of the United States in 1862 settled with this company for the use of their vessel, and paid that amount which the Government thought at the time was due; notwithstanding, this claim for additional payment is here. Some seventy-six days' use of the boat is in controversy. These days were lost to the vessel and to the Government.

By the terms of the charter-party it may be said, possibly, that the time was lost to the Government. But be that as it may, the Government settled at the time for what it regarded as just, and paid what was believed to be due. I have so long and so earnestly, session after session, opposed claims of this sort, I have so often been met with hostility in my efforts to defeat them, that I can go no further. I have appealed to my friend from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], and to other gentlemen who are good lawyers, to examine this matter for themselves, and to say upon their honor as Representatives and lawyers whether they believe this claim should be paid. They have decided in its favor and I do not propose to offer any opposition further than to state that if the gentleman from New Jersey is satisfied this claim ought to be paid, if this committee is satisfied it ought to be paid because it has received the sanction of the accounting officers of the Treasury, I shall not stand here longer in a vain fight, although I believe that the claim should be rejected.

Mr. CANNON. I am not aware, from any investigation that has been made, that any difference has been shown to exist between this claim and many others which would show whether it is a just claim or not. It is not in the power of the Appropriations Committee, who report this bill, to go through all these audited claims. Life is not long enough. If each day could be multiplied by ten, and if men could work without sleep from the beginning to the end of Congress we could not go through and examine each and all of these claims that are certified. It is true that the accounting officers of the Treasury under a former administration, and I believe under this Administration, have audited this claim and that it has met their approval. It is true, further, that all these claims and almost all classes of claims that have been thus audited and certified by the accounting officers of the Treasury to Congress are substantially proper. Now, there are other claims that rest upon the same foundation that this one does that are not included in this amendment.

I presume they have as much merit as this has. The claims I refer to are the Von Hoffman claim, which has been certified by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and also the claim of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. And there are many others of the same kind. Whether the Von Hoffman, which has been audited, is to go in there, or whether the Baltimore and Ohio claim has to go in there, I do not know. I suppose this will go and properly so, but it dictates the inquiry in my mind, which has occurred to me heretofore, and I suppose will time and again hereafter, that we deliberately in our proceedings make fish of one and foul of another. Having said that much about it I will say no more.

Mr. MCADOO. But this claim is the only one which has been certified to by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and the other claims were rejected.

Mr. CANNON. What is that?

Mr. MCADOO. The accounting officers of the Treasury have certified to this claim, but the other ones have been rejected.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the pardon of my friend. The contrary of that is true. The Treasury Department and the accounting officers, as I understand it, allowed all of these claims.

Mr. MCADOO. I am informed to the contrary.

Mr. CANNON. I have just verified my recollection by an appeal to the clerk of the committee, and he informs me that such is the fact; that all of these claims are upon the same footing.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to say but a few words in reply to my colleague [Mr. CANNON]. He is right in his statement that there are other claims equally certified by the accounting officers of the Treasury; but I can assure this committee that the other claims to which allusion has been made stand upon an entirely different footing. This claim has been pending for a long time. There was no question as to the loyalty of the party.

There was no question as to the fact that the property was chartered and used by the Government, and it is simply a question of law whether the Government should pay for some extra days during which the vessel was disabled. I say that much, and yet the other cases to which allusion has been made, while they are certified to as this is, they do not in my judgment stand upon any sort of meritorious ground.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the amount of this claim?

Mr. BURNES. This claim is for $15,000, I believe.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What for?

Mr. BURNES. The Government of the United States chartered a vessel or boat for use during the war on the coast down from New York. It agreed under the charter-party to pay $200 a day, I believe, for the use of the boat. There were some seventy-odd days during which the vessel was disabled and rendered no service to the Government, and the simple question arises whether the Government should pay for those days or not. The Government settled with the parties, paid them for every day that the Government used the vessel, but declined to pay them for the seventy-odd days during which it was unfit for use.

Mr. CANNON. The parties took the money and gave a receipt.

Mr. BURNES. Yes, the parties took the money and gave a receipt.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Was the vessel disabled in the Government service?

Mr. BURNES. I am so advised.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. And under Government command?

Mr. BURNES. That is a question. The Government had sent a man to take charge of the vessel, but he seemed to be incompetent; and some one who was regarded as more competent was put in charge, I believe, by the owner of the boat.

Mr. BAYNE. The disablement was in consequence of that incompetency.

Mr. BURNES. That is in doubt.

Mr. BAYNE. But it has been fully ascertained by two or three officers who investigated the matter and have reported.

Mr. CANNON. I am not disputing the fact that it is a meritorious claim. As I understand, under the charter-party the Government was to pay $200 a day, and this claim is for the additional number of days the vessel was used. Under the proof it appears that this vessel was disabled, had to be laid up for repairs; and the question is whether that $200 a day should be paid for it while undergoing repair in Jersey City. They were injuries that all vessels are liable to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. How did that occur? Was it by carelessness on the part of those in charge? Can the gentleman tell how that collision occurred?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me. I was saying that this boat was taken by the Government under a charter-party at the rate, I believe, of $200 a day, and in the ordinary use of the vessel it became necessary to repair her, as it frequently does while vessels are in use, and she went in for repairs. The Government settled with the parties who owned the vessel for $200 a day for every day that it was in use, but refused to pay for the days that the vessel was being repaired, claiming that that was the proper construction of the charter-party.

The owners received the money as payment in full. Now it appears that the accounting officers of the Treasury construe this charter-party and say that a fair construction gives the owners of this vessel pay for the days that she was undergoing repairs as well as for the days that she was in actual use, and perhaps there are some decisions of the courts to that effect. At any rate the law officers of the Government have so held and have certified this account, and I am not here to dispute that their construction of the charter-party is a proper one. I am not combating the allowance of this particular claim, but I am complaining of the fact that the same law officers who audited and certified this account have certified other claims here year after year and administration after administration, and that we appropriate the money in the one case while we withhold it in the others.

Mr. BURNES. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], my colleague on the committee, seems to be of the opinion that there is some sanctity connected with the opinions of what he calls the law officers of the Government. I was not aware that there was any such sanctity about the opinions of the accounting officers of the Treasury. There is an express statutory provision which makes the decisions of the accounting officers of the Treasury merely advisory, and imposing upon Congress the duty of investigating and considering each claim that may be reported by those officers. The claims which they report are not sent here merely for appropriation; they are not sent here to be paid upon presentation as adjudicated claims; but the law makes it our duty to consider each and every such claim upon its merits, looking to the accounting officers of the Treasury merely for advice.

Mr. BAYNE. Do not those accounting officers invariably give to the Government the benefit of the doubt? Is not that the experience of the gentleman and of other members of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BURNES. That is not my experience. I do not know what experience the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] may have had, but it is not my experience that all accounting officers of the Treasury Department do give the Government the benefit of a doubt.

Mr. BAYNE. But in this case three Auditors and two Comptrollers have passed on this claim and certified it to be a legal liability on the part of the Government.

Mr. BURNES. I am not speaking of this particular claim so much as of other claims to which allusion has been made. Or rather, I am speaking to the duty of this Congress to investigate and consider these claims not as absolute verities sent here merely to be appropriated for, but to consider them on their merits before making appropriation to pay them.

Mr. CANNON. Of the many hundreds of claims appropriated for in this bill, how many has the gentleman or any other member of the committee or any member of this Congress examined by sending for the papers and inquiring into their merits?

Mr. BURNES. My colleague would ask me to plead guilty to neglect of duty.

Mr. CANNON. I am trying to establish the practice of Congress.

Mr. BURNES. And my colleague would ask me to testify to his abandonment of duty. I can do neither one of those things, for the reason that we do give consideration to these matters, and, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations having this bill in charge, I can say that I have never prepared a deficiency bill without giving consideration to every item reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON. What does my friend call consideration?

Mr. BURNES. Well, such consideration as in my judgment may be necessary to protect the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Has my friend sent for the papers and gone over them and examined them in the one hundredth part of these cases?

Mr. BURNES. I have, in all cases that seemed to have any element of doubt or where there was the slightest suggestion of suspicious circumstances. Wherever any suspicion was aroused, or wherever the amount was large I have not hesitated to send for the papers and examine them as I would examine the papers in a case for a client in court, but I must confess that there are many little claims for soldiers, for horses lost in the Army, for allowances of various kinds for small amounts as to such claims.

I have generally come to the conclusion that there was nothing in them to excite suspicion, and that they made no duty for further consideration than could be given upon a mere glance. Therefore, sir, I have looked over all those items in such a manner as to give them what I believed to be the only practical consideration that was required. Whenever a claim comes before us that involves a large amount of money, or that is twenty-five or thirty years old, or that has been lying long before the Departments, or that is surrounded with circumstances suggesting inquiry, I have uniformly, in every such case, carefully examined the claim, and I think that is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations, as it is the duty of this House under express law.

Mr. CANNON. The only point I make is this, and I want to make it again, that as to the auditing of claims the Committee on Appropriations is not a body that is adapted to consider them judicially, and that, so far as my experience goes, it does not do so. Here and there in some of these audited claims—I doubt if one in a thousand—the committee have sent for the papers and gone through them, and after doing so they have not been any wiser, in my opinion, as a general rule, than they were before. In other words, the accounting officers of the Treasury, under the law and under a practice as old as the Government, substantially examine these claims and certify them to Congress, and then, as a general rule, they are appropriated for.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this particular claim should bear the brunt either of the neglect of the committee or its inability to examine the numerous claims presented to it. This claim should stand upon its own basis. If it is right, it should be paid; if it is wrong, it should be rejected.

My experience with officers of the Government under former administrations and under the present Administration has uniformly been that a claim, to be allowed by these officers, must not only have equity in its favor, but it must be a legal claim against the Government. The Government officials are technical in their consideration of claims against the Government. If a claim has only equity in its favor they may recommend it to Congress, saying, "There is a strong equity in this case," but they will not allow the claim.

Before they allow any claim they find that there is a legal liability on the part of the Government to pay it. The equity in support of a claim may be strong—may entitle a particular claim to more favorable consideration than many a legal claim—natural justice may dictate the payment of the claim, because of its equitable basis, more strongly than if a legal liability were fastened upon the Government, yet the comptrollers and auditors, so far as my experience goes, will not allow any claim unless there is shown an absolute legal liability on the part of the Government. In these cases they find such legal liability. Why should we not pay the claim?

Mr. COBB. Does the gentleman believe that a legal liability exists in case a full receipt was given by these parties upon settlement?

Mr. BAYNE. No receipt in full was given; there was simply a receipt for the amount paid; no receipt was given for the whole claim.

Mr. COBB. I understood the fact to be that there was a controversy between the Government and the parties as to the amount of the demand, and that a receipt in full was given.

Mr. BAYNE. Oh, no; there was no receipt given in full satisfaction; there was a receipt given for the amount paid. Besides, I think this Government is too great and too honest to take advantage of any such thing as that.

Mr. COBB. But I understood you to say there should be a legal liability to pay before we appropriate for a claim.

Mr. BAYNE. And the three Auditors and two Comptrollers of the Treasury Department have found that there is a legal liability to pay this claim.

Mr. COBB. Did they take into consideration the receipt?

Mr. BAYNE. Of course they did; they knew all the circumstances; and they have found that the legal liability exists notwithstanding that receipt. This is a perfectly clear and just case. I think there should be no hesitation on the part of an honest Government in paying the claim.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to inquire whether the Appropriations Committee has, in the bill reported to the House, recommended the payment of this claim.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then this is an amendment offered in the House.

Several MEMBERS. Yes.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MCADOO, it was agreed to, there being—ayes 37, noes 20.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOCKERY). The Chair will now direct the Clerk to return to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], which will be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of War to complete the monument at Washington's Headquarters at Newburgh, N. Y., and the statues thereon, according to the plans adopted by the Joint Select Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives under joint resolution of the two Houses, and for gates therein according to the recommendation of the Secretary of War, contained in Executive Document No. 336, Fiftieth Congress, first session, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $32,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has taken counsel on this question with eminent parliamentarians of this body; and the opinion prevails in some quarters that this is a "very close question." The amendment seems to "change existing law;" and yet it is claimed to be in order under that clause of the rule which authorizes appropriations for the continuance of "such public works and objects as are already in progress."

Mr. CANNON. Will the Chair be kind enough, while referring to the rule, to cause the provision of existing law to be read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to state the question. This point of order has been made under section 3 of Rule XXI, which prohibits the recognition of any amendment "changing existing law." The amendment appears to change existing law by repealing that provision of the joint resolution in question, which fixes the appropriation at $25,000; for this amendment proposes to increase the limit in the sum of $32,000. Another clause of the same section, however, would seem to authorize the amendment—the clause providing that appropriations shall be in order for "public works and objects already in progress." In view, therefore, of all the facts, the Chair has decided to submit the point of order to the decision of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON. With reference to the merits of this proposition I would be right glad to know as a member of the committee what the language of the original provision of the appropriation is, not of the rule with which we are familiar, but the provision of law that authorized this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the joint resolution to which the gentleman refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Public resolution—No. 24.]

Joint resolution concerning the erection of a memorial column at Washington's Headquarters, at Newburgh, N. Y.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That sections 2 and 3 of the joint resolution of Congress approved July 1, 1882, authorizing the Secretary of War to erect at Washington's Headquarters, in the city of Newburgh, N. Y., a memorial column, and to aid in defraying the expenses of the centennial celebration to be held at that city in the year 1883, be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read as follows: "That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in the erection of a suitable monument or column on the grounds belonging to the State of New York, and known as Washington's Headquarters, with such inscriptions and emblems as may properly commemorate the historical events which occurred at Newburgh and vicinity during the war of the Revolution: Provided, That the design for said monument or column, with the inscriptions and emblems to be placed thereon, shall be subject to the approval and adoption of the joint select committee directed to be appointed by the joint resolution to which this is an amendment: And provided further, That no part of the said sum of $25,000 shall be used in defraying the expenses of said centennial celebration."

Approved, March 3, 1883.

Mr. CANNON. That does not seem to be the original resolution, but amends it. In order to determine the question presented here it seems to me we should have the original resolution read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has endeavored to obtain the original resolution, and will now cause it to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is in contemplation by citizens of Newburgh, State of New York, to commemorate the proclamation of peace, the disbandment of the Army, and other notable Revolutionary events by appropriate centennial ceremonies, to be held at Washington's Headquarters, in said city of Newburgh, during the year 1883; and

Whereas the events in question, forming as they did the closing scenes in the struggle for independence, are in every respect worthy of being commemorated and should be perpetuated by the erection of some suitable memorial structure; and

Whereas it was near this place, in the log building known as "The Temple," that Washington by his appeal to the patriotism of the Army saved the country from military despotism; and

Whereas it is intended to purchase the grounds upon which the Temple stood, together with so much of the surrounding land as may be deemed necessary, and cause to be erected thereon a building of frame or logs in the original form or style of the said Temple as near as may be; and

Whereas it is further intended to purchase certain other adjacent grounds wherein rest the remains of the Revolutionary veterans who died during the encampment of the Army near Newburgh, and cause the same to be properly inclosed, to the end that they may be perpetually kept and maintained as a burial ground: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a joint select committee be created, to consist of five Senators to be appointed by the presiding officer of the Senate, and eight Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, whose duty it shall be to make, independently of itself or in connection with the trustees of Washington's Headquarters and the citizens' committee, all necessary arrangements for a befitting celebration of the centennial ceremonies commemorative of Washington's refusal to accept a crown, the proclamation of peace, the disbandment of the army, and other notable Revolutionary events, to be held at Washington's Headquarters, in the city of Newburgh and State of New York, in the year 1883.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to expend, out of the moneys hereinafter appropriated, a sum not to exceed $10,000 in the erection of a suitable monument or column on the grounds belonging to the State of New York and known as Washington's Headquarters, with such inscriptions and emblems as may properly commemorate the historical events which occurred at Newburgh and vicinity during the war of the Revolution.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purpose mentioned in the preceding section, and for aiding in defraying the expenses of said centennial celebration, and for the purposes mentioned in the preamble hereto, the same to be disbursed under the direction of the said joint committee at such times and in such manner as will best promote the objects and intent of this resolution: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated by this act shall be paid except on bills and vouchers approved by the Secretary of War as just and proper charges; and that no bills shall be contracted, or liabilities incurred on account of the United States in excess of the appropriation hereby made.

Approved July 1, 1882.

Mr. BACON. These two resolutions having been read together, it will perhaps facilitate the understanding of the committee as to what is desired here, if I should state the change which was worked by the last resolution upon the former one. At the beginning it was proposed to have a celebration which should be a joint celebration, the expense of which was to be borne one part by the government of the State of New York and one part by the Government of the United States. Subsequently that portion of it which charged any portion of that expense upon the Government of the United States was repealed by the House by the resolution which has been read here, and no portion of it was borne by the Government of the United States; and the effect of the two resolutions, as I understand them, is this, that the Government of the United States determined to erect upon the reservation held by the State of New York, on the grounds upon which stands Washington's Headquarters, the ground upon which the army was disbanded, and upon which Washington took leave of the officers of the army, a monument which should commemorate these events in the life of our nation, and left the form and manner of the monument to be determined by a commission to be appointed for that purpose, and who should determine as to the plan of the same.

The executive department of the Government had nothing to do with it except to construct a monument in accordance with the plans which the legislative branch had, in the manner stated, adopted. Now, the Department has gone on with this work under its charge. It has reached a certain point of completion and the monument has been partly built, but the monument has not been closed by gates, it is in an unfinished state, and it is not creditable to the Government that it should remain longer in that condition.

The appropriation which I have suggested provides the amount which will be necessary for the completion of the work which Congress has already ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is addressing himself to the merits of the proposition instead of to the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to address myself to the point of order for a moment, and I do it for the reason that I do not want to see a ruling made here in Committee of the Whole on a point of order which may involve us in a great deal of trouble if not in inextricable confusion hereafter. As I understand the two resolutions the State of New York as a matter of fact owns certain lands about Newburgh, and wanted to get up a centennial celebration, and wanted the Government of the United States to take part in it as well as the State. New York State had already begun the erection of a monument at its own cost, and they had proceeded to have a trustee appointed, created by law of New York, touching the work.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I desire for the information of gentlemen to state that the State of New York ceded the lands to the Government of the United States for the specific purpose of this monument.

Mr. CANNON. So far as the resolutions are concerned, and so far as the committee or the House has any knowledge, the Government of the United States has nothing to do with the ownership of this property. It does not own a foot of the land as far as any information to us is concerned. Men did just as they do now. Some colleague in that Congress, an estimable gentleman, no doubt, who desired to have something done that would promote improvements in his district, a very laudable object, I presume, and in good nature and in good temper, as we are acting here to-day, succeeded in securing the enactment by Congress of the first resolution to help to construct, or at least to contribute something towards the construction of, a monument upon grounds that the Government did not own.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. They do own them.

Mr. CANNON. Now, the second resolution was passed; $25,000 was appropriated further, and I suppose has been expended. Under the first resolution—and the gentleman will correct me if I am incorrect—the money was spent. Then comes the resolution appropriating $25,000 more——

Mr. BACON. I hope the gentleman will pardon me. There is but one appropriation of $25,000. The $10,000 appropriation for the celebration was recalled and was never used, and the only amount was $25,000.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. So that there were $25,000 used as a donation by the United States Government, for the improvement of lands it does not own, under that law or resolution.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But under the order of the Congress of the United States to commemorate most memorable events in our history.

Mr. CANNON. And on property of the government of the State of New York.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And under the dominion of the American flag.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the gentleman can not by the play of words befog this matter.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No, I am not befogging it; the gentleman is.

Mr. CHEADLE. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. CHEADLE. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL] to say that the New York State government ceded this land to the United States Government.

Mr. CANNON. I understood him to say that, too, but has the gentleman the act? Will he show us anything in support of it?

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Oh, yes; the gentleman can easily find the facts. Why, the very centennial celebration last year will furnish sufficient evidence of that fact.

Mr. CANNON. But the gentleman has not the act of the State of New York ceding this property. Besides that, it takes two to make a contract. Now, if the action of the United States Government has been had with reference to accepting this donation I would like to see that evidence.

The State of New York can not cede land to the Government of the United States without the consent of the Government, and there is nothing in either of these joint resolutions that shows that the Government ever accepted it so far as anything appears officially to this Congress. It spent the $25,000 as a mere donation on property belonging to the State of New York to be used for the purpose of erecting a monument.

Now, then, my point is this——

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. What does the Secretary of War say?

Mr. CANNON. That has not been read and I have not read it, and I do not know whether the gentleman has or not.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] has it.

Mr. CANNON. If it sheds any light upon this matter, let us have it read. It is not sufficient for gentlemen living as they do in various States to say we want to build a monument to commemorate a national event. To make an appropriation to build a monument upon ground that belongs to the State is one thing, and to build a monument to be under the control of the United States is another thing. To make an appropriation in Congress to help the State of New York build a monument to be controlled by New York is still another thing.

Mr. BOUTELLE. On this point, in regard to the control of the property on which this monument is to stand, if I am correctly advised, I should state that it is in the hands of an association.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can only be heard on the point of order made by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON. I want to be heard on the point of order, and the point I want to call attention to is that this is an appropriation by the Government of the United States to complete a work that belongs to the State of New York. I say it is not such a work of the United States in line of construction as comes within the reading of the rule. I would be glad to hear from the gentleman from New York about that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I was about to endeavor to shed what little light I have upon that point.

Mr. CANNON. There ought to be no legislation until the State of New York should grant to Congress or the Government this land, and if it is a work of the Government of the United States in progress there is an official way to ascertain the fact. There should be two things, namely, an act of the Legislature of the State of New York and an act of Congress authorizing the expenditure of money; and in the absence of these two things it is not a work of the United States in progress.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to speak to the point of order, and upon that point I want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] if a state of facts something like this does not exist: That the State of New York has ceded to an association of patriotic citizens quite an extensive tract of land in the city of Newburgh, N. Y., on the Hudson, on which are located the historic headquarters of George Washington, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a public park for the commemoration of the occupancy of that place by the great commander of the Revolutionary forces; that those patriotic citizens have for years maintained and improved these grounds and this historic place; and if it was not directed by laws of the State of New York, and that now it is proposed to erect a monument at that point of a more permanent character than the structure of a house, toward the completion of which, upon this ground, a commission has been appointed by the State of New York for the purpose of superintending this national commemoration? It is a matter of national history, and the Government should contribute a portion of the expense to complete the monument upon that spot. Is that the fact?

Mr. BACON. Substantially.

Mr. CANNON. Who owns the land?

Mr. BOUTELLE. The land is owned by the Washington Headquarters Association.

Mr. CANNON. A private corporation?

Mr. BOUTELLE. A public corporation for a public purpose—to commemorate a national event and to protect matters of historic, national interest.

Mr. NUTTING. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] allow me a moment?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. NUTTING. The property was first owned under precisely the same circumstances as the Regents of Mount Vernon own the property on the Potomac—an association for the purpose of preservation.

Mr. CANNON. Is that such a work in progress as comes within the meaning of the third clause of Rule XXI, authorizing an appropriation to be made? That is all I want to know.

Mr. BACON. That is the question to which I would like to address myself for a single moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated to the committee that the question is, Shall the point of order made by the gentleman be sustained? Does the gentleman desire to be heard for a moment further on that?

Mr. BACON. I understand that the point of order was submitted to the committee, and I desire to be heard a single moment in response to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. I want to be entirely frank about it, and I want the House to understand that the ground upon which this monument is to be erected, and is now in process of erection, was many years ago acquired by the State of New York and put into the hands of certain patriotic gentlemen as trustees, to hold and preserve it as a public reservation and to preserve the site of the old building made memorable by the important events heretofore referred to. These gentlemen have served without pay always, and out of their own means and out of the funds of the community and by appropriation from the State of New York preserved that property to the present time.

The legal title to the land is held by the trustees. They had no charge of the erection of this monument. Now, sir, I entirely fail to see what the question of ownership of the land has to do with determining whether it is a public work in progress. If the Government of the United States chose to erect buildings upon somebody's else land, what has that to do with the question raised by the point of order? It is a public work whether the ground on which it stands belongs to the United States or to sombody else. I do not think that there can be a successful dispute that the Government of the United States has begun a public work on these grounds and that it ought to complete it.

Congress adopted the resolution that it should be erected; it appointed a joint committee to adopt a plan upon which it should be erected. The Government has commenced its erection according to that plan; it expended the money under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the building, so far as it is erected, has been built under instructions and under the supervision of an engineer of the War Department. At no point has anybody, except the Government of the United States, interfered with it; and I assert that it is a public work in progress of construction by the United States upon any possible interpretation of that phrase in the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question to the committee; but before doing so begs leave to say that being only a temporary occupant of this position, he feels some hesitation in passing upon the point of order, because of the contrariety of views presented by different parliamentarians. The Chair entertains no doubt, however, as a personal opinion that this amendment is obnoxious to the rule, but will submit the question to the committee for its decision. The question is, Shall the point of order presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] be sustained?

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, in order that every gentleman may vote intelligently upon this question, and in order that we may ascertain how far gentlemen will discriminate or be influenced in the consideration of a point of order by the merits or the demerits of a proposition, I desire to call attention to the language used in the original resolution. By that language it is expressly stated that these grounds are the property of the State of New York.

There is no pretense that they are not the grounds of the State of New York, and the appropriation originally made appropriated a fixed sum of money, $10,000 of which might be used for the purpose of erecting a suitable column. There was no undertaking of a public work; the appropriation simply gave the right to use $10,000 for the erection of this column, and the subsequent appropriation of $25,000 was limited to such use, with the provision that no liability in excess of that amount should be created against the Government. Now, is that a public work? Does the Government of the United States undertake public works upon ground belonging to a State?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understood Colonel CAMPBELL [Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL] to say that these grounds had been conveyed to the United States.

Mr. BURNES. Well, if Colonel CAMPBELL or any other colonel asserts that it is his duty to show the record of title.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does not the Government do public work upon almost every bend of the Mississippi River?

Mr. BURNES. That is provided for by another provision in the rules, so far as public works on rivers and harbors are concerned.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not see why the question of the gentleman from New Jersey does not go directly to the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri. The gentleman from Missouri asked whether the Government of the United States prosecutes public work upon lands not ceded to the United States. Now, if it does prosecute public works upon any river or harbor, or in any State, upon lands not ceded to the United States, it seems to me that that fact answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. BURNES. The Government of the United States has perfect and complete jurisdiction over every navigable stream, and it is no part of the purpose of Congress to appropriate for the banks of the river. Our appropriations are made for the improvement of the navigation of the river and for that alone.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, no.

Mr. BURNES. Undoubtedly. Without such an understanding no river and harbor bill could ever pass Congress or receive the sanction of the President of the United States. There is no doubt about that. We go upon the ground, and the river and harbor bill goes upon the ground, that the money is appropriated for the improvement of the navigation.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You do not pretend that the works upon the banks of the Mississippi are conducted upon grounds owned by the United States?

Mr. BURNES. I claim that the Government has complete jurisdiction over the whole Mississippi.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Over the banks?

Mr. BURNES. Over the entire waters, currents, and channels of the river?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am speaking of the improvements on the land.

Mr. BURNES. I know of no such public works. I know of no authority for any such works.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It would take but very little trouble to call the gentleman's attention to some very extensive ones.

Mr. BURNES. I know of none whatever. All the public works of the United States on the Mississippi look to deepening the channel, confining the river to its bed, and improving the navigation. It is for that purpose that the appropriations are made, and if you undertake to pass a river and harbor bill upon any other principle you will never pass it through this Congress or any other.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the point of order taken by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] be sustained?

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 46, noes 13.

Mr. BACON. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is made that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

The Committee of the Whole proceeded to divide.

Mr. BACON (after the count had been continued for some time without the appearance of a quorum) withdrew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of "no quorum" being withdrawn, the point of order is sustained by the vote of the Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will proceed to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Judicial:

Fees and expenses of marshals: For fees and expenses of marshals, United States courts, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1887, $50,000.

Mr. SAYERS. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the following:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for defending suits in claims against the United States, as reported by the Attorney-General, $129.17.

In explanation of this amendment I send to the desk certain papers to be printed in the RECORD:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, July 19, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with my promise made yesterday to furnish you statement showing the deficiency of $129.17 in defending suits in claims against the United States, found in Executive Document No. 376, Fiftieth Congress, first session, page 22, being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting estimates of appropriations to supply deficiencies, I send you detailed statement.

The expenses were necessarily incurred; were for cross-examination of witnesses made upon agreement in cases where if such expense had not been incurred testimony would have been taken ex parte. It will be observed that a considerable portion was taken at remote points. The accounts have been duly audited.

Trusting that you will at the right time offer the proper amendment to the deficiency bill,

I am, very respectfully,

F. P. DEWEES. Assistant Attorney.

Hon. J. D. SAYERS.

DEFENSE OF SUITS IN COURT OF CLAIMS.

Amount on hand		$413.70
A. M. Watson, Pittsburgh, Pa	$90.00
Charles E. Yeater, Sedalia, Mo., 8 cases	248.80
Williams & Turney, Dallas, Tex	10.00
Allan R. Joy, Livingston, Mont	30.00
Lafayette Dawson, Sitka, Alaska	39.50
S. W. Willis, Jackson County, Alabama	8.07
John McBrooks, Memphis, Tenn., 5 cases	80.00
Robert Miller, United States commissioner	35.00
Baltimore and Ohio Express	1.50
Total deficiency		129.17
	542.87	542.87

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of regular official fees provided by law for official services of United States district attorneys, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1887, $41,923.08.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line 17, insert—

"For payment to Joseph Campbell, of Phœnix, Ariz., for assisting in prosecution of certain fifteen Apache Indians charged with murder before the United States court at Phœnix, Ariz., $1,500."

Mr. BURNES. I reserve a point of order on that amendment until I hear the statement of my friend from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard only a moment, and I think my explanation will show that the point of order is not well taken. Section 363 of the Revised Statutes empowers the Attorney-General, in cases where he deems it necessary, to employ counsel to aid the regular district attorneys in the prosecution of cases in the Federal courts. When fifteen Apache Indians demanded separate trials before our court in Arizona it was impossible for the district attorney, with the business on his hands, to attend to the matter. Besides, those Indians were defended by able counsel, and the Attorney-General very wisely employed equally able counsel in the prosecution of the cases. In some of these cases appeals were taken, and the fee of $1,500 is certified by the judge of the court, as required by law. The fact of the appointment of this attorney by the Attorney-General disposes, it seems to me, of the point of order. The services have been rendered and there is no place in which provision can be made for payment except in this deficiency bill, unless this man be relegated for relief to a private bill, and we know how soon that would be passed. There is a letter from the Attorney-General, which I believe I have, appointing Mr. Campbell as assistant to the district attorney in these cases.

Mr. BLOUNT. Why may not this item be paid out of the fund just voted in this bill?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I understand from the Department it can not be so paid. Here is a letter from the Department of Justice on this subject:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, June 25, 1888.

SIR: Inclosed are copies of papers of the 13th instant, being a letter of the special assistant attorney, Joseph Campbell, and of his account, and approval thereof by the court, for expenses in the trial of certain Apache Indians at the May term of the second district court of the Territory of Arizona, forwarded for presentation to Congress for action; the services having been incurred under the appointment of Judge Porter, of the second district court, who assured the Department that he would try to secure from Congress an appropriation in payment for Mr. Campbell's services.

Very respectfully,

G. A. JENKS,
Acting Attorney-General.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The acting Attorney-General was mistaken in the statement which would seem to imply that Mr. Campbell's sole employment was under the appointment of Judge Porter. Although it is true that Judge Porter in the first instance appointed Mr. Campbell to assist in the prosecution of these cases, yet before the trials commenced the Attorney-General wrote a direct formal appointment of Mr. Campbell. The mistake made in the statement of Mr. Jenks was, I presume, the only reason this appropriation was not put in the bill by the committee.

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], in whose integrity I have the fullest confidence, assures me that the appointment in this case was made by the Attorney-General prior to the rendition of the service. There is no doubt that the law gave the Attorney-General power to make the appointment; but I have had nothing placed before me as a member of the committee indicating that the Attorney-General did in fact appoint this gentleman to prosecute these cases. I am now assured that such a letter is in possession of the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I can not lay my hand upon it at this moment, but I will print it in the RECORD.

Mr. BURNES. With that understanding, I withdraw the point of order.

The letter referred to by Mr. SMITH, of Arizona, is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, May 21, 1888.

SIR: You are hereby appointed an assistant to the attorney of the United States for the Territory of Arizona, to assist him in the prosecution of the cases against certain Apache and Maricopa Indians, charged with murder.

Your compensation will be determined by the Attorney-General upon the completion of your services, your account for such services to be verified by affidavit and approved by the United States district attorney.

Execute the customary oath of office and forward the same to this Department without delay.

A. H. GARLAND,
Attorney-General.

JOSEPH CAMPBELL, Esq.,
(Through Owen T. Rouse, esq., U. S. attorney, Territory of Arizona), Phœnix.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that the amendment be modified so as to read "to enable the Attorney-General to pay," etc. That will prevent giving it the force of a private claim.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. That will be satisfactory to me.

The amendment as modified was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of regular official fees provided by law for official services of United States district attorneys, $300.

Mr. BURNES. In line 19, on page 30, I wish to offer an amendment to insert, after the word "attorneys," the words "being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1886."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of assistant attorneys: For payment of regular assistants to United States district attorneys who were appointed by the Attorney-General at a fixed annual compensation, and to reimburse them for the reduction of 20 per cent., more or less, made at the beginning of the fiscal year 1888, $40,550.

Mr. ROGERS. I now send up, in accordance with the suggestion I made on Saturday, the amendment which I wish to propose to this paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the paragraph, between lines 3 and 4, page 31, insert: "To enable the Attorney-General to continue to employ able and skillful lawyers in cases wherein he deems their services absolutely necessary, and to pay for services already rendered and to be rendered under existing contracts, $30,000.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to submit to my friend from Arkansas a provision which I would like to have inserted as a part of the amendment, if the committee shall see fit to adopt the amendment, in the following words:

Provided, That this appropriation shall not be taken as indicating an intention on the part of Congress to waive the provisions of section 3679 of the Revised Statutes in case of future accounts of this character.

Mr. ROGERS. What is that section?

Mr. BURNES. That is the section which provides that no Department of the Government shall expend in any one year more than the actual amount of the appropriations therefor.

Mr. ROGERS. I have no objection to the modification; but it does not occur to me as being necessary.

Mr. BURNES. I do not know that it is necessary, but as the amendment is in some conflict with it, I think it better to incorporate the proviso.

Mr. ROGERS. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the two propositions will be treated as one amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. I have no objection to it.

On Saturday last, Mr. Chairman, I argued at some length as to the propriety of the modification which my amendment suggests here. It is only necessary now to make a very brief remark, since I do not deem it important to go further into the question of details at this time. I do think, however, in this connection, that I ought to have read the closing paragraph of the Attorney-General's report for the year 1887, as it invites attention to a matter which I think the country will be compelled by force of circumstances to give attention to at an early date. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

REORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

There has been no reorganization of the Department of Justice since its establishment in 1870. Of course, additional officers have been provided for new districts when created, but the appropriations for United States courts have for years averaged very nearly the same amount, while the business of the Department has constantly grown, until it has assumed its present vast proportions; and the increase of its force has not kept pace with the increase of business.

A great deal of this work is of a kind not to be expressed in statistical tables in such form as to convey an adequate idea of its important or laborious character. Nor can the results achieved by it be shown in that way or by the exhibition or enumeration of material objects produced. Quite recent acts of Congress—the Bowman act, the French spoliations act, and the act giving circuit and district courts of the United States concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Claims—have thrown an immense amount of business upon the Department, to which the determination of the Government to protect the public domain from plunder has added a large and increasing number of land frauds and timber-trespass suits. Bureaus in other Departments have expanded into proportions never thought of at their formation. In this Department only the work has grown. I take it that in disbursing the appropriations placed under the Department of Justice the question what will best subserve or protect the interests of the Government is first to be considered, and I am convinced that an examination of the way in and purposes for which these have been and are expended will show, if the amount and character of the work done under them is intelligently considered, the difference in favor of the latter which I have mentioned, and that such increases in them as may have been asked for are rather in the direction of economy than extravagance.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. H. GARLAND, Attorney-General.

Mr. ROGERS. There is one additional observation that I would like to make by way of inviting the attention of the House to the question of the organization of that Department as at present constituted. The entire force attached to the Department available for the purposes for which the Depertment was originally created, consists of the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and two Assistant Attorneys-General. The Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General argue all cases before the Supreme Court of the United States, and the two Assistant Attorneys-General argue cases, one of them before the Court of Claims and the other before the Supreme Court of the United States when he may be so directed by the Attorney-General, or the Solicitor-General when acting as Attorney-General. So that these four officers constitute really the entire force of the Department, and all of the litigation of the Government in the District of Columbia devolves upon and must be carried on by them.

It is true there are some law clerks, I do not now recollect how many, but I believe four or five or six, who are also lawyers, there, and assist in these cases at times in the way of taking proofs, preparing papers, and matters of that kind, but these constitute really the force of the Attorney-General's Department; and of cource the remainder of the force, the clerks in the office, are required to keep up the records and do the mere clerical duty of the office. So when you come to consider the question of organization, it is not, with reference to a Government like ours, a very elaborate or extravagant one, especially in view of the fact that litigation in which the Government is engaged has grown largely within the last few years.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to ask a question. Is this an appropriation for the fiscal year 1889?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir; for the current year.

Mr. CANNON. And upon the deficiency bill that appropriates for the deficiencies of last year?

Mr. ROGERS. That is precisely what it is, as I understand it.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask why it should not have been upon the sundry civil bill, where it properly belongs?

Mr. ROGERS. I will state my understanding. I have already said that I was not here when the appropriation bill in question was considered, but took my family away because of sickness.

Mr. CANNON. I was not here either.

Mr. ROGERS. But it seems the appropriations committee did not think the information as to the estimates of the Department, was sufficient to justify them in making the appropriation, and they cut down the estimate of the Department on the sundry civil bill from $40,000, to, I believe, the sum of $15,000, if my memory serves me right. So this is simply asking us now, as I explained on Saturday evening last, to make an appropriation to meet the expense of special attorneys and the necessities of the office which have not yet been provided for.

I do not know. I am not prepared to answer the question as to whether or not this bill carries only the deficiency of the last fiscal year. I suppose it carries it for last year as well as this.

Mr. HOOKER. I will inquire of the gentleman from Arkansas whether his amendment looks to the payment for future services in which attorneys are to be employed.

Mr. ROGERS. It looks to the compensation of attorneys already employed, as well as those that are to be employed in case of necessity. I put a statement of the cases in the RECORD on Saturday. There are a great number which have recently been instituted in relation to public lands, and timber trespasses, and that sort of thing.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I looked in vain in the report for any explanation of the paragraph from line 21 to 24, inclusive, on page 30, and lines 1 to 3, on page 31, appropriating a sum of $40,550 to make up some reduction of 20 per cent., more or less. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri how that reduction came to be made. As I understand it, from the wording of the bill, these are the regular assistants, and their salaries are at a fixed annual compensation. How was it that this deficiency arose? How was it that this 20 per cent. came to be deducted from their salaries?

Mr. BURNES. At the commencement of the present fiscal year the Department found it necessary, as we are informed, to apportion the whole sum appropriated for the whole service. In doing so, and in order to make the service effective, and to enable it to go around, it was necessary to reduce the compensation 20 per cent., because there was not money enough, by 20 per cent., to pay the attorneys.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then, as I understand it, the force has been increased, and the compensation has been decreased.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from New Jersey, if I have not failed to catch what has passed between him and the gentleman from Missouri, is asking if the salaries were not decreased. I will explain that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I simply asked if the force had increased and the compensation decreased.

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, they were decreased. In other words, it arose in this way: The Appropriation Committee, in consulting with the Treasury Department in reference to the fees of the regular district attorneys and the assistant district attorneys, were advised to separate the two classes of persons, so that the exact sum should be appropriated for the payment of the regular district attorneys, and also recommended that the appropriation should be made for the assistant district attorneys.

In making that division of the two classes of officers an error was fallen into in the sum allowed for the assistant district attorneys. The allowance for the salaries was too small to cover the salaries of the regular assistants. I think it was done inadvertently, and it ought to be corrected and the salaries restored.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to ask whether they would disburse it on these claims the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] called our attention to the other day.

Mr. ROGERS. You are speaking of the telephone cases.

Mr. REED. He means the Pan-Electric.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I simply want to know where that $40,000 came from, and what disposition was to be made of it.

Mr. ROGERS. On that subject I have no information whatever. I assume what was stated by my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] in debate the other day was correct. I presume it came in the ordinary way; that this amount that is now reported by the Committee on Appropriations came out of the round sum for the employment of special attorneys; but as to that, I am not specifically informed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman accept an amendment to that amendment by making it so that it will not pay the balance of these fees which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] spoke of the other day; or does he know whether it would be applied to the payment of those claims?

Mr. ROGERS. Upon that subject I have no information whatever. Mr. Chairman, I stated on Saturday, when I occupied the floor, that the paper I introduced was handed me by my friend Colonel OATES, who is thoroughly informed on this subject, but who has gone to New York to take part in the investigation of the foreign immigration without giving me the details. I suppose, of course, that if this $30,000 is appropriated it will be added to the $15,000 already appropriated; and if anything is due on account of the cases referred to it would be paid out of this sum, but I do not know whether anything is due or not.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman admits that a portion of it may go that way. Will he state that he believes the Government had the legal right to institute that proceeding?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am not going into that. I do not propose to review the action of the Department in that matter.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wanted to know whether it was authorized or not.

Mr. ROGERS. I believe that the Judiciary Committee of the House, of which I am a member, in the Forty-ninth Congress, with perhaps one, or may be two, exceptions, I do not remember now, decided that the Attorney-General had power to institute a suit of that kind if he saw fit. I do not undertake to decide between the Judiciary Committee and the courts.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Did the court so decide?

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman from Arkansas is not quite as accurate in that statement as he usually is in his statements. I think he has probably made a mistake.

Mr. ROGERS. I intended to be accurate, and think I am substantially so.

Mr. BURNES. In the appropriation for this service for the fiscal year 1887, it was the intention of the committee to appropriate a certain sum for the payment of regular assistants to the United States attorneys; but the language used to accomplish that purpose was not very apt, and the Department of Justice construed it to mean that they had a right to pay out of that fund not only the regular assistant attorneys but also any special counsel that might be employed under the law. Therefore the requirement upon the Department to pay for such special service reduced the aggregate amount which was intended for the regular assistants, but which, as I say, the language of the appropriation seemed to authorize the Department to use also to pay for special service.

The amount appropriated for assistant attorneys would have been sufficient if we had used in the bill of that year the language that we use this year. This year's appropriation is confined to the regular assistants of the United States attorneys.

The discharge of the obligations imposed upon the Department by the employment of special counsel depleted the amount for the regular assistants to the extent of, as is estimated, 20 per cent. Therefore, in appropriating this 20 per cent. now, we appropriate it to pay the regular assistants that which is precisely their due, and which would have been paid out of the regular appropriation if the language of the former bill had been the same as the language of the present bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand the gentleman now to say that the language used in lines 21 and 22 of the bill applies to regular assistants to United States attorneys. By that does he mean the regular assistants in each district, or assistants employed in some particular way?

Mr. BURNES. The regular assistants in each district. It is not intended to be used to pay for services rendered by special counsel in any case.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "already rendered and;" so that the provision will read: "And to pay for services to be rendered under existing contracts, $30,000.'

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I will state in a few words that my sole purpose in offering this amendment is to prevent any further payment to some gentlemen who, in my judgment, have already been enormously overpaid for their services in connection with special litigation.

Perhaps the language of my amendment is too sweeping, but I am willing to modify it so as to effect that purpose and that purpose alone. A number of the objects mentioned by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] in his remarks on Saturday last are very praiseworthy. In this bill we provide for a more thorough enforcement of the law against contract labor; and whatever appropriation is necessary to enable the Department of Justice to more thoroughly enforce the laws on that subject that we have upon the statute-book ought to be, and I have no doubt will be, cheerfully granted.

But while providing for that, we should be careful how we legalize these back claims, which have no semblance of justice. In other words, I do not want any of this money to be diverted from that use to pay a man a hundred dollars for sleeping all night. [Laughter.]

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] should not be adopted. This question was fully discussed pending the consideration of the sundry civil bill, and a similar amendment, submitted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], was rejected by the House. The sundry civil bill as it passed the House contained a provision appropriating $10,000 for the payment of special attorneys employed under the direction of the Attorney-General. The Senate Committee on Appropriations amended this provision by increasing it from ten to fifteen thousand dollars.

The appropriation of so small a sum for this purpose will have a tendency to abolish the vicious and expensive system of employing special attorneys to assist the United States district attorneys. These law officers, with their regular assistants, ought to be able satisfactorily to transact the legal business intrusted to them. If this amendment should be adopted it would increase the appropriation provided for in the sundry civil bill for the payment of special attorneys from fifteen to forty-five thousand dollars. This is an enormously large sum of money to be expended for this purpose when the public business should be transacted by those regularly employed in the public service.

Now, so far as the appropriation of $40,550 provided for in the paragraph under consideration is concerned, I would like to have the gentleman in charge of this bill indicate to the House the character of the different items which make up this amount. Does this bill include an appropriation of nine hundred and eleven dollars and some cents, the balance claimed by Grosvenor P. Lowrey, one of the special attorneys of the Government in the Bell telephone suit, and who has already received over $12,000? It will be remembered that this is the gentleman who charged the United States $15 an hour while engaged in familiarizing himself with the intricacies of the law involved in the Bell telephone suit; $100 a day while traveling from New York to Cincinnati and return; $100 a day while there, besides a fee of $500, and $171.50 for traveling expenses for himself and clerk and a hotel bill of $70. Surely these special attorneys are an expensive luxury.

Mr. BURNES. My friend from Pennsylvania will understand that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] speaks for itself, and that it does not purport to give the elements that demand the expenditure of this amount.

Mr. SOWDEN. I have reference now to the appropriation in this bill of $40,500 for the payment of assistant attorneys.

Mr. BURNES. If the gentleman refers to the item at the bottom of page 30, I beg to say to him that no part of that amount can possibly be paid to Mr. Lowrey or anybody else who is employed as special counsel, because the whole of this money goes exclusively to the regular assistants of United States attorneys all over the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that amendment ought to be adopted. If the gentleman from New Jersey desires to single out the Pan-Electric fees, let him do it if he thinks that is a proper thing to do.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is not proper even as to all of those, but it is proper as to some of them.

Mr. ROGERS. But I speak of the fact that the gentleman's amendment is broad enough to cover not only what he is striking at, but also other proper services which may have been rendered in any other proper litigation. The amendment provides that the Department shall be prohibited from paying for services which may have been rendered in pursuance of law and in pursuance of contracts already made and for a proper purpose. I submit again in this connection that there can be no such thing as government if you strike out of it confidence.

It is utterly impossible to have anything like civil government if you say that the different departments have no confidence in the other departments, and the effect of an amendment like this is to say that we have no confidence in the Department of Justice in the discharge of the duties imposed upon it, and that therefore we shall undertake to instruct it as to what it shall and what it shall not do. The amendment it seems to me is entirely too broad.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman know of any other services rendered under contract and not paid for that are not provided for in this bill?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not; but does my friend know that there are not a number of cases of that kind? Indeed I do not profess to know anything about whether there are or not.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman will remember that he is undertaking to amend the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman has proposed an amendment, and it is his amendment I am discussing.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I propose to curtail the operation of your amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. I do know of one case which occurs to me, and for which provision has just been made, where it was found that the fund was about to be exhausted, and the Department was confronted with the provision requiring it not to make contracts in excess of previous appropriations.

An important piece of litigation was going on in the city of Philadelphia; the parties were there, under notice duly served, taking depositions; and the Department of Justice in that particular case was compelled either to recall the counsel representing the Department and permit the testimony to be taken ex parte, or to allow its counsel to continue to act until the testimony had been taken. I allude to this case (for which, as I have said, provision has just been made) to illustrate the importance of not adopting an amendment which may prevent the Department from doing that which under the circumstances ought to be done.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But the gentleman must remember that his amendment undertakes to bring into this bill a new feature in legislation, a provision giving the Department of Justice what may be called a contingent fund of $30,050 to be expended solely in its discretion. Such a provision, if adopted, ought to be carefully guarded.

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, there is nothing new about it. You may go back twenty years and you will not find a time when there was not a contingent fund of this kind, and appropriated without any sort of restriction. There are numerous precedents in that regard.

But having addressed these suggestions to my friend from New Jersey as a lawyer, let me say to him that his amendment, if adopted, will not accomplish anything, because the sundry civil bill already carries an appropriation of $15,000 for expenditures of this kind—an appropriation without any limitation whatever. The Department of Justice can, if it chooses, take that fund and use it for the very purposes that he is now endeavoring to prevent. So that his amendment will not accomplish anything except to say to this Department in reference to this fund what has never been said before when a similar fund has been voted, "You shall not use this fund for such purposes as are customary and proper."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then the $30,000 proposed in the gentleman's amendment is in addition to $15,000 in the sundry civil bill, making $45,000 in all.

Mr. ROGERS. I have so stated.

The question being taken on Mr. BUCHANAN'S amendment to the amendment of Mr. ROGERS, it was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Is the proviso of the gentleman from Missouri attached to this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is a part of it.

Mr. ROGERS. I accepted that.

The amendment of Mr. ROGERS was rejected; there being—ayes 24, noes 30.

Mr. HERMANN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether the clause preceding this, providing for the payment of the fees of district attorneys, applies exclusively to the deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887. Was there any deficiency reported to his committee for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, or does any such deficiency exist?

Mr. BURNES. Only about $300.

Mr. HERMANN. I was under the impression there was a deficiency in regard to the payment of many of the district attorneys for that year.

Mr. BURNES. The clause in the bill is intended to cover all the deficiencies that have been reported to us as occurring in 1886.

Mr. HERMANN. The language is "being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1887."

Mr. BURNES. Three hundred dollars is all that has been reported to us as a deficiency for 1886.

Mr. HERMANN. Then I am satisfied.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Before we pass from this part of the bill I ask unanimous consent that permission be given to return to it hereafter. I think the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] or some of us will be able to draught an amendment which will accomplish the specific object he seeks in a manner to be acceptable to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks that permission be given to return hereafter to this part of the bill in order that an amendment in the same direction as that which was offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] may be submitted.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have only this to say: I have no objection to return to the paragraph and put it in. My action has been taken at the suggestion of the Solicitor-General, Mr. Jenks, and the House saw fit in its judgment to reject the proposition, and therefore I have nothing further to say about it. Of course I have no more interest in it than any other member on the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from New Jersey again. Is there objection?

Mr. DUNN. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the Clerk will proceed with the next paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Support of prisoners: For support of United States prisoners, including necessary clothing and medical aid, and transportation to place of conviction, being for the service of the fiscal year 1886, $12,675.04.

Mr. BURNES. I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to come in after line 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of bailiffs, United States courts: For pay of bailiffs and criers; of expenses of district judges directed to hold court outside of their districts; of meals for jurors when ordered by the court; of compensation for jury commissioner at $5 per day, not exceeding three days for any one term of the court; for stenographic clerk for the Chief-Justice, and for each of the associate justices of the Supreme Court at a sum not exceeding $1,600 each, $25,000.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not understand the full purport of that amendment, and would like to reserve the point of order for the present.

Mr. BURNES. In answer to the gentleman from Arkansas, I would simply say that this is the regular estimate coming to us from the Department of Justice. It seems to be an absolute deficiency so far as the pay of baliffs is concerned. The multiplication of courts, and tendency to increase expenditures by judges of courts, who have control in most instances, have made this a deficiency, and have rendered it absolutely necessary for the appropriation to be made.

So far as the private secretaries to the judges of the Supreme Court are concerned, that is a proposition that every gentleman understands for himself. They have been authorized by law.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not see how this changes existing law.

Mr. BURNES. I do not think it changes existing law.

Mr. ROGERS. Does it limit the number of bailiffs?

Mr. BURNES. No, sir; it is to pay for services already rendered, and for no other purpose whatever.

Mr. ROGERS. Let the amendment be again reported.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. For the information of the gentleman from Arkansas I can state to him that the bailiffs have received no salary inside of three months.

Mr. ROGERS. Let us have the amendment read.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. ROGERS. I have no objection.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. KERR. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the session of Congress is believed to be drawing near its close, and yet no action has been taken by this branch of Congress to comply with the public demand for such modifications of the pension laws as will afford relief to the large number of disabled soldiers and widows and orphans of deceased soldiers who are now dependent on the assistance of friends and of the communities and States in which they reside.

The President, on the 6th day of July, sent to the Senate the veto of the private pension bill of Mary Ann Dougherty in which he stated that he could not "spell out" the principle on which the bounty of the Government was bestowed through the instrumentality of a flood of private pension bills, and added the following advice:

It seems to me that it would be well if our general pension laws would be revised with a view of meeting every meritorious case that can arise. Our experience and knowledge of any existing deficiencies ought to make the enactment of a complete pension code possible.

The fact that this communication was sent to the Senate after the adjournment of the St. Louis convention, which made no declaration on this subject, has suggested the inquiry whether it was not made to supply that defect in the Democratic platform. But the fact that it came so late in the session, when it will be difficult to comply with the recommendation, rather than in the annual message or earlier in the session, has in some minds raised doubts of its perfect sincerity.

But assuming that it is entirely sincere, it seems to me it is incumbent on the committee and the House and those who control its action to take immediate steps to comply with this recommendation of the Executive, and thus redeem the pledge made by the Government to the men who risked life and health for its preservation.

The House recently passed a bill appropriating $250,000 for the care of disabled soldiers in soldiers' homes. I am aware that it was contended on the other side of the House that Congress did not have constitutional power to pass such a bill, and the Democratic platform adopted at St. Louis reaffirms the old doctrine of strict construction for the first time since 1856; but it ought not to be questioned that the United States has the power to care for all who have been injured in their means of support by their sacrifices in war in its defense, and if the power is conceded the duty to exercise the power should not be in doubt.

This is the performance of a plain obligation. If the Government should fail of this duty the burden would necessarily fall on local aid either by friends or the State or community, and Congress should not compel communities or States to submit to taxation for the purpose of raising money to discharge obligations that properly belong to the Government of the United States, and than which no duty is more sacred. There certainly is no excuse for this at the present time, when in the opinion of many the danger from a large Treasury surplus is the greatest danger that threatens the country. The duty of some action is conceded to relieve these unfortunates, and surely Congress should not adjourn until some action on the subject is taken.

The fact that the recommendation of the Executive has been addressed to the Senate, which has passed a bill affording a great measure of relief, rather than the House, that has thus far taken no action, should not deter the House from considering the subject. A petition has been signed by the almost solid delegation on this side of the House urging action. If the President were in earnest, considering how faithfully his recommendations have been followed on other subjects, it is doubtful if the party of the majority would dare to defy an earnest request for legislation on this subject urged by him and supported as it is by the unanimous desire of the members on this side of the House.

A committee representing the Democratic majority of this House has the power to fix a day for the consideration of this measure, and the country will hold that party responsible if this Congress adjourns without having been permitted to provide the relief demanded by a patriotic people.

The chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who stands before the country as candidate for governor of Indiana on the Democratic ticket, in his speech which was printed in the RECORD this morning, but which, I understand, was not delivered in this House, makes use of the following language in reference to the bill which the majority of the committee of the House for some mysterious reason has submitted as a substitute for the bill recommended by the Grand Army of the Republic which recently passed the Senate:

It must be borne in mind that this pension is not for any disability contracted in the service. If it was the length of service should of course not be considered, for the man who incurred a disability the day after he entered the service is clearly entitled to as much as one who suffered the same disability near the end of a long term. These considerations can be confidently submitted to the candid judgment of a just and liberal people, and I believe will meet the approval of that large body of the survivors of those who defended the Union, who I know believe in even-handed justice between comrades as well as between citizens.

I am quite well aware that some of the most conspicuous of the newspapers assuming to be the organs of the soldiers assailed the rate fixed by the last bill, but subsequently they became clamorous for its passage, and others have maintained its justness from the very beginning of the agitation of this question.

If this principle is established now it is not too much to expect that it will obtain in the universal pension bill, which all admit is fast approaching and sure to become a law.

The condition of dependence was eliminated by the Democratic majority of the House committee and the bill made to apply to all who are disabled, and so that which the great representative body of the ex-soldiers regarded as obnoxious and offensive was willingly remedied; and upon this question the substitute proposed may be fairly considered to be, as far as expressed, the policy of the Democratic party, while the Senate bill, with a condition of dependence necessary to be proven to entitle one to a pension, may be justly said to be the policy of the Republican party upon this great issue.

I say this because such a bill not only met the approval of the Republican Senate, but again was indorsed by all the Republican members of the House committee.

The chairman is not correct in saying that this pension is not proposed to be given for disability contracted in the service. There is a large body of disabled men who need the Government aid and who are dependent, but who are not able to prove that their disability was caused by their service, and who yet feel sure and the people feel sure that that disability is mainly due to the hardships, exposures, and sicknesses they suffered, but which they are not able to prove at this late day. The chairman of the committee says very truly that the money appropriated as proposed in the substitute would "disburse in small sums and go directly to the people and quickly reach the avenues of trade, and will go to those who will spend it because they need it."

This would be more certainly true under the provisions of the Senate bill than under the House substitute. I can not agree with the hopeful view taken by the chairman of the committee in regard to the early passage of a pension bill in the speech from which I have quoted. There is a seeming purpose "to hold the word of promise to the ear" of the invalid soldiers of the country while by substitutes, by tardy recommendations, by refusals to consider their claims by the party in control of the House, "they break that promise to the hope."

The passage of the bill recommended by the Grand Army of the Republic, and which the Senate approved and sent to this House, would afford a great relief. It would prevent that great body of men, who are presumably disabled because in the hour of the country's danger they went forth in its defense, from being compelled to rely on private charity or the local aid of the States. When this is accomplished it will be time to consider a measure of justice to the soldiers who are not in present need. The chairman of the committee should not burden a measure which has the double purpose of doing justice to worthy soldiers, their widows and orphans, and relieving the States from a burden, with an additional provision which involves a debatable claim.

My excuse for offering these extended remarks at this time is because of the appearance in the RECORD of this morning of the speech of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON], to which I desired to make some suitable response.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KERR. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. KERR. Then I will content myself with simply asking leave to print additional remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNES. I heartily sympathize with my friend from Iowa who has just taken his seat, for I know full well that he is not happy over the healthy condition of things existing in regard to the soldiers of the Republic whose just rights and honors are found to be safe in the keeping of the present Administration. It is sometimes, however, found to be necessary, or at least appropriate, to make a slight cut through the mere coating with which a sham solicitude regarding pensions to worthy and suffering soldiers is too often covered. This is effectively and fairly done by the simple observation that no administration of the General Government since the war has shown a more commendable disposition to do full justice to the soldiers of the Union or to make more tender or liberal provisions for their widows and orphans than the present national Administration.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to a patriotic duty devolving upon us all in connection with this very bill, and which shall put to the test the real love of gentlemen for the needy soldiers and those dependent upon them.

In this bill are appropriations for near ten thousand soldiers, their widows and orphans; appropriations for money due them for bounty, back-pay, commutation of rations, horses lost in the service, etc. They are in need of the sums found due them, and they need them at once.

Propositions to load this bill with stale, extraneous, and worthless claims, thereby endangering its passage and threatening to so gorge it as to deprive it of the approval of its friends and of the country, are being widely made, and all who look first to the interests and rights of the soldier should join the Committee on Appropriations in opposition to such claims and help gladden the hearts of the ten thousand soldiers named in the hill.

I ask that the Clerk read the next paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will assume the pro forma amendment to be withdrawn.

The Clerk, under the head of "House of Representatives," read as follows:

To pay to the widow and legal heirs of the late J. T. Updegraff, a member-elect to the Forty-eighth Congress, who died before the time of its organization, $6,000.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to offer some amendments. I send them to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 34, after line 20, insert the following:

To pay accounts for stenographic work done for the committees of the House during the present session by other than the official stenographers, and which are recommended by the Committee on Accounts, namely, to A. Johns, $566.75, and to James O. Clephane $82.50, in all $609.25; and such claims to be audited by the Committee on Accounts, and paid on their approval by the Clerk of the House.

For compensation of a page in the enrolling-room of the Clerk's office, recommended by the Committee on Accounts, from and including August 1, 1888, to July 1, 1889, at $60 per month, $660.

To pay John D. O'Connor for services as clerk to Committee on the Eleventh Census from the 9th to the 17th of January, inclusive, $54.

To reimburse Thomas Bell for expenses incurred from July 1, 1886, to March 1, 1888, for assistance as laborer in the folding-room, $200.

Mr. BURNES. Unless objection is made I need not make any statement in regard to these items.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask by unanimous consent to consider this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse the five Official Reporters of proceedings and debates of the House of Representatives for moneys paid by them so far during the present session for clerical hire and extra clerical services, $1,000 each—$5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this is a new departure.

Mr. BURNES. I do not know what the amount has been heretofore, but I will state to my friend from Indiana that this has been an expensive session for the Official Reporters. It has been lengthened out, and is likely to be lengthened out still further; and I believe that under the circumstances this should be allowed.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the largest amount that has been allowed?

Mr. BURNES. I believe between $600 and $700.

Mr. REED. I do not make any objection. The experience of this session, as I believe, would admonish us to employ additional reporters, because I think the work which our present corps has had to perform has been plainly too severe for them to endure; and the real remedy in the future would be to have an addition made to the force so that they can have an opportunity to do thorough reporting, and that they should not be overworked, as they have been this session. They have had a very severe test in having sessions from 11 o'clock until 5, which have been an outrage, not only upon them but on all, and they have had night sessions also. I think they should have some spare time; and I think they should have sufficient compensation, but the true remedy is to have an additional force.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SAYERS. Before the gentleman from Indiana says anything I would like to furnish the committee some facts concerning the labors of the corps.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. The question is whether the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] is not subject to an amendment. Can I offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not yet before the committee.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that from the beginning of the session up to and including July 18 there have been 677 more columns reported than were reported for a like time during the Forty-ninth Congress, and there have been reported in the House during this session 3,500 columns more than were reported in the Senate. These stenographers are required, of course, to hire clerical assistance in order to prepare the matter so that the RECORD shall be ready for the House when it meets the next morning. I do not remember that they have failed a single time, and I am told that they have been confined until late hours in the night, even when there were no night sessions, in order to get the matter ready for the Public Printer. Here is a comparative statement of the work done in the Forty-ninth Congress and in the present Congress:

Comparison of time and amount of debate reporting in the House of Representatives between the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress and the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, from commencement of each session up to and including July 18th of each session.

Congress.	Number of working days.	Number of working hours.	Number of columns reported.
First session, Forty-ninth Congress.....	167	937	7,660
First session, Fiftieth Congress.....	170	947	8,337
Increase in Fiftieth Congress	3	10	677

The time and amount of debate reporting in the Senate during the same number of days in the first session of the Fiftieth Congress is: Number of working days, 133; number of working hours, 596¾; number of columns reported, 4,775; making a difference between the Senate and House work as follows:

The House reporters worked 37 days more (or 350 working hours more) and reported 3,562 columns more than the Senate reporters from the commencement of the first session of the Fiftieth Congress up to and including July 18, 1888.

From these facts I think that the House ought to make this allowance.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not design to interpose an objection to this allowance; but at the same time I think it is greatly to be regretted hat there is such a steady increase in the expenses of this House. Every session of Congress some occasion arises for an increased appropriation of money. Every session shows a large increase upon its predecessor. But I concede that in this instance the claim has a better foundation than in former years. There has been an immense amount of work done by the reporters. While I am willing that this allowance shall be made, I do not want to establish a precedent in these matters. I shall make no objection in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to entertaining the amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. I send to the desk an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay, at the close of the present session, to the officers and employés of the House borne upon the annual roll a sum equal to 10 per cent. of their annual compensation, and to pay those borne upon his roll a sum equal to 10 per cent. of their aggregate compensation for this session at its close, a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to reserve the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. I understand that the gentleman made no point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and inasmuch as my proposition is an amendment to that amendment, the question might arise whether the point of order does not come too late. I heartily concur in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and I do so for the reason that I think there are no officers in the employ of the Government who more honestly earn their compensation than do the stenographic corps of the House of Representatives. Their labors are extremely arduous. The education necessary to the proper performance of those labors is one very difficult to acquire, and I am told by skilled stenographers here and elsewhere that there are remarkably few who attain perfection in this wonderful art of transcribing on the instant the words as they flow warm from the lips of the speaker, and who preserve it, because, like other difficult arts in every department of science, mastery of it can be maintained only by constant and assiduous practice.

The work of the corps of stenographers of this House who take down with such wonderful accuracy every word that falls from our lips, even when the House observes the most perfect order, as it sometimes does when there are not more than half a dozen gentlemen speaking at the same time [laughter]—the skill and accuracy with which they follow the thread of our proceedings through the babel of confusion which prevails here, is a matter of astonishment and amazement to me when I read the RECORD every morning.

They perform this work with great skill and ability, and they deserve to be considered by this House, especially at this session, when, in addition to the regular work of the day, there have been a great many night sessions, entailing the prolongation of their labors sometimes into the wee sma' hours, for, after taking down here the words which we utter, they are compelled to sit up sometimes for hours in transcribing their cabalistic characters, in order that we may read our proceedings in the RECORD next day.

I think, sir, that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas is an eminently proper one, and that these officers who perform this difficult and valuable service for the House and for the country should receive this consideration. But while I think this amendment is a proper one, I think that the amendment I have offered also commends itself to the judgment and the sense of fairness of members.

As to all the other officers and employés of the House, all the clerical force who have been necessarily compelled to be constant in attendance and hard at work during the days and nights of this long session, which now seems likely to extend even beyond the summer months—as to those officers and employés it seems entirely proper and reasonable that they too should receive consideration at the hands of the House. In former years it was the custom at the close of a long session of Congress to pass a resolution giving one month's extra pay to all the employés, and I understand that that custom continued until about two years ago, when somebody raised the point that it was an unwise expenditure of money. My amendment is offered instead of such a resolution.

Mr. Chairman, the payment of legitimate compensation for services rendered is, it seems to me, wise economy. When a public officer is inadequately paid for the performance of his work, it is not only unjust to him, but it is bad economy for the Government and the people whom he serves.

I therefore concur most heartily in the amendment which has been offered by my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]. At the same time, I insist that the clerical and other force of the House should be recognized as equally entitled to compensation for the extra service they have been compelled to render by reason of the unusually protracted session of this Congress. It will be observed that the amendment which I offer does not propose to take effect until the adjournment of Congress, which, if we may judge from the present outlook, from the speculations of the newspapers, and from what we can anticipate as to the occurrences at the other end of the Capitol, will, in all probability, be the 1st or the 15th of September, if not the 1st of October.

As for myself, if the session should continue that long, I do not see any reason why we should not go on and let this session of Congress merge into the next, and allow the public business to proceed without interruption. Indeed, I avail myself of this occasion to say that I think the time is not far distant when the sessions of Congress will necessarily continue all the year round except the short recess, which ought to be taken during the summer solstice. I am going to prepare, if no other gentleman does so, a bill proposing a different period for the assembling of Congress, in order that, instead of having a long and a short session, the two sessions may be equalized. By this means we can avoid the necessity which now recurs every two years of sitting during the extreme heat of the summer months. I think, therefore, if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, in which I heartily concur, be adopted, my amendment to that amendment ought to receive the favorable judgment of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to submit a few remarks in reply to those of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER]. I always regret to differ with my distinguished friend. His proposition, if I understand it correctly, is to pay an additional compensation of 10 per cent. to all the annual employés of this House.

Mr. CANNON. And also session employés.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, it embraces also session employés. Mr. Chairman, there is no act which we can perform so pleasant as one which gratifies this large body of promising young gentlemen—around us here in the public employment. If our liberality which is to gratify them were performed at our own expense—not at the expense of the hard-working people of this country—the pleasure we would experience in the exercise of this liberality would be without alloy. But the question is whether we can afford to gratify them and please ourselves at the expense of the public Treasury.

Mr. HOOKER. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will allow me to suggest that, while I have no doubt he has a great many hard-working constituents, I question very much whether a single one of those constituents works harder than does the honorable gentlemen from Indiana, their Representative.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a very kind remark; and it is one which can be applied much more truthfully to my friend from Mississippi. [Laughter.]

But while, sir, it is a pleasant thing to gratify our friends by increasing their salaries, it is the most unpleasant duty which a member of this House is ever called upon to perform—and I have felt obliged to perform it often—is to object to a measure of liberality of this kind proposed in behalf of the public employés with whom we are constantly and daily associated. That is an unpleasant duty; yet I must insist that there are some duties we are compelled to perform; there is some limit to the generosity or liberality of this House at the expense of our constituents.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, the best paid employés of this Government are those of the House and the Senate. This is natural, as they are constant associates of members of the House and Senate. Of course all gentlemen here know that fact. Most of us have friends and intimate associates among this force of employés.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is true of gentlemen on your side.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is now especially the case with gentlemen on this side. We have friends from our own districts on this force; so that this question becomes somewhat, and unpleasantly, personal, and nothing would induce a member to raise his voice against a proposition of this sort unless it were a sense of public duty. But I for one have objected to this kind of legislation when the other side of the House was in power, and can not pursue a different course now.

But, sir, upon what principle can this proposition be sustained? The seats on this side of the House are filled with gentlemen who occupy them by virtue of the pledges made to the people that economy should prevail in every department of the public service. But for that pledge we would not be here. Can we deliberately add 10 per cent. to the salaries of the employés of this House now drawing ample salaries? Of course the same proposition will follow as to the employés of the Senate, who are still better paid. These gentlemen, excellent and worthy as they are, and however well they perform their duties, are, everything considered, the best paid employés of this Government. I did not feel justified in objecting to the proposition to increase the compensation for the time-being of the Official Reporters of the House.

We must all admit that their duties have been unusually arduous. Their work confines them here not merely during the sessions of the House, but for hours and hours afterward, frequently until the small hours of the morning. We have kept them employed unremittingly day and night for a long period of time; and hence I felt that, so far as that part of the proposition was concerned, objection ought not be made.

A MEMBER. And they have been at great expense for the pay of their assistants.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is suggested to me that they have also been compelled to incur unusual expense in the employment of assistants to do the large amount of work thrown upon their hands. But, sir, I think the House would not be justified in adopting a sweeping proposition to increase the compensation of all the employés of this House 10 per cent. I am certain it ought not to be done. I think this side of the House can not do so consistently with the pledges we have made to the people and the duty we owe them. I must, therefore, insist on the point of order I have raised.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The gentleman from Indiana has made a point of order upon the amendment to the amendment. The Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. If the Chair is disposed to rule that my amendment is not germane to the amendment already offered, I would like to be heard for a moment before the Chair makes a final decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOOKER. The proposition has been made by the gentleman from Texas to pay additional compensation to certain of the officials of the House because of unusual expenses incurred by them, to wit, the Official Reporters. That question is now before the House, whether by unanimous consent or otherwise, or whether it was in the regular order, it does not matter so far as the question of parliamentary procedure is concerned. It being in order now, either by consent or otherwise, for the consideration of the committee, it is undoubtedly subject to amendment, and any objection which might be made to an amendment could not be tenable unless it was an objection which could be made to the subject-matter itself.

I submit therefore, Mr. Chairman, that inasmuch as the House has agreed to consider the subject-matter of the increase of the compensation of a part of its employés, it follows as a matter of course that the subject-matter being now before the House and under consideration and within the control of the House, that it is subject to amendment or alteration. If that were not so, Mr. Chairman, you would be placed in this awkward predicament: You would be compelled to vote upon the substantive proposition of the gentleman from Texas, denying the House its ordinary parliamentary power of legislation to amend by enlargement, curtailment, or in any other way. It therefore limits the power of the House, to rule as the Chair has indicated its intention of ruling; and the parliamentary power of the House to change, alter, or amend a proposition which has been offered by consent would be entirely destroyed. I therefore submit to the Chair that if the amendment is before the House for consideration at all it is subject to all amendments to which any proposition may be subject under the law. Otherwise, of course, the mere consent to consider a proposition would be a restriction on the power of the House to adopt such parliamentary modifications as the judgment of the House might approve.

Mr. HOLMAN. The proposition having been admitted by unanimous consent, it stands exactly on the same footing as if it had been in the original bill. It will be a very dangerous doctrine to adopt as a proposition of parliamentary law that when a subject of that kind is pending before the House it may be susceptible of amendment by the addition of a proposition that is foreign to the bill and not admissible under the rules of the House.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER. Do you claim as a principle of parliamentary law that if this had been in the original bill it would not have been subject to amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; if it had been in the original bill it would have been subject to the point of order, I said; and if the point of order had not been made it would have been before the committee for consideration. But that fact would not have warranted the consideration of an amendment which was clearly subject to the point of order when the point was made against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the subject of the amendment is different from the pending proposition. The pending proposition is to pay a sufficient sum to cover certain expenditures made by these officers of the House. The Chair would entertain any amendment that might be submitted to increase or diminish that amount as being in order, that being before the House by unanimous consent; but a proposition to increase the compensation of the employés generally of the House, or of the Members of the House or of the Senators, by introducing another provision not authorized by law, is not germane and in order as an amendment to a provision to pay the stenographers.

For that reason the Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, which will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I would like to inquire of the gentleman who presents the amendment whether the late Mr. Edwards, one of the Reporters of the House, would get any portion of the compensation proposed? I want to say here that I have no doubt in the world, from my own personal knowledge of his condition, that his death was largely due to overwork in the House, and provision ought certainly to be made in his behalf, if the amendment in its present form does not cover it.

Mr. SAYERS. I am not able to furnish the gentleman from Illinois with the information he asks.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. It ought to be extended to him to reimburse him in a fair proportion for the sums paid by him. I understood that there had been some difficulty with reference to the payments to his successor, and that is the reason I ask now for information.

Mr. HOOKER. Let it be amended in that form.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I move, therefore, to include in it the late Mr. Edwards, or the representatives of Mr. Edwards's estate.

Mr. SAYERS. I am informed by the gentleman from Arkansas that it has been customary to give to the family of the deceased employés of the House one-half of one year's salary.

Mr. CANNON. That will not cover the point here, though. When did Mr. Edwards die?

Mr. SAYERS. About ten days ago, I think.

Mr. CANNON. There would be, of course, manifest impropriety in paying to his successor, who has occupied the position but a very short time, as much as would be paid to the other stenographers who have been working during the whole of the session. It ought to be made to include the present stenographers and Mr. Edwards, and the division could be made between his legal representatives and his successor.

Mr. SHAW. If the gentleman will permit me, there is now pending before the Committee on Accounts a proposition to pay to the legal representatives of Mr. Edwards one-half of his annual salary for one year, and I have no doubt that it will be soon reported to the House.

Mr. CANNON. But that does not cure this, because a stenographer who has been here but two weeks would certainly not be entitled to the same compensation that those who have worked during this entire session should be entitled to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I suggest as a modification of the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois that the payment in this case be made to the widow of Mr. Edwards.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I do not think I would accept that. I think it had better go to the legal representatives.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I understand the widow is the proper person to receive the compensation in this case.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. If that is the judgment of the committee, I have no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. I will modify the amendment so as to exclude the successor of Mr. Edwards.

Mr. CANNON. It ought to be to include Mr. Edwards, and also his successor, so that a division might be fairly made between them.

Mr. SPINOLA. The amendment ought to be so modified as to provide specifically for the family of this deceased employé of the House.

Mr. BAYNE. I desire to make the amendment include the late J. K. Edwards—$750 to be paid to the widow of the late J. K. Edwards and $250 to his successor.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I desire to ask if a successor has been appointed to Mr. Edwards?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman so that it will provide that $900 be given to the widow of the late J. K. Edwards and $100 to his successor.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that no successor has been appointed?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Well, then, let it all go to the widow.

Mr. BAYNE. I withdraw my proposition. I want it all to go to the widow.

Mr. LONG. I ask, by unanimous consent, that this be passed over, that during the evening the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] may perfect the amendment he desires to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TARSNEY. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 20 insert the following:

"To pay Samuel D. Craig for extra services connected with the preparation of the Calendar and indexing the same for the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, $600."

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order on the amendment, but will reserve it if the gentleman desires.

Mr. TARSNEY. I offer this amendment inasmuch as the House last Friday passed a resolution for the payment of this sum to Mr. Craig. It was passed upon a report of the Committee on Accounts, which is to be found on page 7611 of the RECORD. This was a service performed by him in the preparation of the Calendar for this House, something that this clerk has never yet been called upon to do. The Committee on Accounts are unanimously, as I understand the report, in favor of it, but said that they had no jurisdiction but to submit a resolution to the House, and the House on last Friday adopted that resolution; and therefore this is but carrying out the recommendation of the House that it be offered as an amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that that resolution instructed the Committee on Appropriations to report this as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. TARSNEY. It did. I have the resolution here, if you will permit me to read it. This is the resolution reported from the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That there be paid to Samuel D. Craig the sum of $600 for extra services in connection with the preparation of the Calendars and indexing the same for the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, and that the Committee on Appropriations be directed to provide for the payment of said sum in the bill (H. R. 10836) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and prior years, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the rule which would otherwise prevent the consideration of this amendment has been suspended by the operation of the resolution passed by the House, and that the resolution is now in order.

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman who is the beneficiary of this provision occupies a seat at the desk and is receiving a salary of $3,000 a year. Just exactly what his duties may be I am not advised, but I apprehend it will be considered he is receiving a just, reasonable salary for all the work that he is called upon to perform.

The fact that he is occupying the position he is is evidence that the salary paid is sufficient for this work. He is a representative, agent, or servant of the House, and it is his business to obey the orders of the Clerk, and perform any labors that may be laid upon him. If the pay is insufficient for his work, give him $3,600; but I say to you, gentlemen of the committee, that if you raise that salary to $3,600, you should raise them all along the line. There is no reason why you should not raise the salary of every individual that holds a position at that desk if you raise the salary of this clerk.

Mr. TARSNEY. Permit me to say that the services for which this compensation is claimed are reported by the Committee on Accounts as not pertaining at all to the ordinary duties of the tally clerk of this House. It is extra work that has been imposed upon him, which has never been performed by any gentleman in his position on this floor, and it is work which requires him also to work extra hours, to work in the night and to work early in the morning, in order that the Calendar may be properly prepared for us, instead of compelling us to search over the records so as to find the information. If this House were to direct one of its officers here to perform the duties of a page, and he did it, or the duties of a messenger, and he did so, that would be an extra service; it would not be a part of the regular duties imposed upon him when he accepted his office here. Why should we not pay him, instead of employing another to perform the same service and add one more to the roll of employés? We are receiving the benefit of this labor. It must necessarily be imposed upon somebody else if not performed by this gentleman; and if one of our employés outside of his regular line of duties performed this work, why not pay him, instead of somebody else? It strikes me that it is equitable and fair, and that the Committee on Accounts made this report after fully considering the matter. Therefore I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CANNON. As a member of the minority I am perfectly content that the majority who control this House of Representatives and designate its employés shall pay them whatever they choose; but I do not want you to do it under false pretenses. For aught that I know the gentleman mentioned in this resolution ought to have $3,600; yet I do have the impression that he does not any more deserve it than the reading clerks and the other clerks at the desk do. I am satisfied that if you will examine this index you will find it is a reference to the cases on the Calendar, arranged alphabetically. How much time it takes to prepare it I do not know, but I should think it would not be a very onerous work. All that I am going to do is to protest against increasing the salary of this gentleman $600 for this work, and therefore I will move to strike out of the resolution the statement that this increase of pay is for making this index, because that is a mere pretext.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. SOWDEN. Were not the salaries of all the clerks at the desk increased at the end of the last session of the Forty-ninth Congress $600 with the exception of this one?

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect; but we are legislating now in the Fiftieth Congress. Understand, I am not opposing this appropriation. You gentlemen on the other side control this House and I am willing that you shall pay its employés what you please. I shall have some remarks to submit before I get through in the way of reply to the annual contribution offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to the literature of "economy," but I do not care to submit them on this question, and I have risen merely to make one single point. If you want to increase this salary $600, increase it, but do not offer as an excuse for your action something which does not exist in fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "for extra services in connection with the preparation of the Calendar and indexing the same for the first session of the Fiftieth Congress" and insert the words "in addition to," so that the provision will read: "To pay Samuel D. Craig in addition to his present salary $600."

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk a copy of the RECORD showing the report of the Committee on Accounts upon this resolution and the action of the House upon that report, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay to Samuel D. Craig, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $600, in full compensation for preparing an index of the Calendars of the House for the first session of the Fiftieth Congress.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution providing for the payment out of the contingent fund of the House to Samuel D. Craig the sum of $600 for extra services in the preparation of the Calendars, having considered the same, report that, in the judgment of your committee, the amount asked is very reasonable. The extra work on the Calendars is 40 per cent. at least in excess of any previous session, and there has been added an index (prepared by Mr. Craig) which has been of great benefit to the members as well as the public at large. The compilation of this index alone is well worth the sum asked, and the committee would recommend the passage of the resolution if the same were a legal charge upon the contingent fund; but as it is not, your committee therefore report the following substitute and recommend its adoption:

"Resolved, That there be paid to Samuel D. Craig the sum of $600 for extra services in connection with the preparation of the Calendars and indexing the same for the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, and that the Committee on Appropriations be directed to provide for the payment of said sum in the bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and prior years, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the Committee on Accounts.

The substitute was adopted.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. SOWDEN. I raise the question of order. It is not in order to introduce an amendment of that character at this time. We are operating under the order of the House. The House ordered the Committee on Appropriations to report an appropriation of $600 for the payment of Mr. Craig in the resolution just read. Now, the gentleman proposes to change the order of the House by the introduction of this amendment.

Mr. BURNES. I would like to know what are the duties of Mr. Craig. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. SHAW] what duty Mr. Craig has to perform except that of a tally clerk?

Mr. SHAW. I am advised that he prepares the Calendar. That, I think, is part of his duty. During this session, at the request of the Clerk, he has added to it an index, which, if the gentleman has had occasion to consult, he has doubtless found exceedingly convenient. It is the duty of Mr. Craig twice a week to put upon this Calendar all matters that are presented for consideration, and also to see that the index is properly kept up, that bills which have passed the House are struck from the Calendar and new ones added to the list, so that he is kept constantly on the alert.

Mr. BURNES. Now, then, we have the information. The tally clerk has nothing to do except to keep tally and to make this index.

Mr. SHAW. And the Calendar.

Mr. BURNES. The making of the Calendar is a part of his duty. It appears that he has improved the Calendar by adding an index, and if he does any extra work at all it is not in the making of the Calendar, but in the preparation of this index. So I understand the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts. This gentleman receives $3,000 for performing the duties of tally clerk and making the Calendar. Now, because he has, with commendable industry and kindness, made an improvement upon the Calendar, does that give him a claim for extra compensation for extra work? Is he overburdened to such an extent by the preparation of this index that he should be paid $600 over and above his salary for it? I feel, Mr. Chairman, that this House will surely not enter upon such legislation as this.

Mr. SOWDEN. It has already done it.

Mr. BURNES. I wish to say another word. The reading clerks get $3,000 a year each, and what work do they do? I need only ask the question. Members of this House have seen them toiling and struggling night and day in the performance of duties that almost placed their lives in jeopardy. Shall they receive no more than the tally clerk? Think of it a moment, Mr. Chairman, and let this House determine in a spirit of justice whether it will raise this salary to $3,600 and leave those other clerks at $3,600.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has made a point of order against the amendment to the amendment. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment to the amendment is in order. The House instructed the committee to report the original proposition in this bill. It was not in the bill; and it was in order to move its insertion. The proposition being in order, and before the Committee of the Whole, it is in order to submit any amendment to it which is germane. Therefore the Chair entertains the amendment to the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. SAYERS. I now ask the Committee of the Whole to recur to the amendment which was passed over in regard to the stenographic corps.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole will now recur to that amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment as now submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse the five Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House of Representatives for moneys paid by them so far during the present session for clerical hire and extra clerical services, $1,000 each, $5,000; $1,000 of which shall be paid to the widow of the late J. K. Edwards, he having been one of the said five Official Reporters as herein provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the amendment last adopted the following:

"To pay Alexander Vangeuder the sum of $500 as compensation for services rendered as assistant clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the second session of the Forty-ninth and the first session of the Fiftieth Congresses."

Mr. BURNES. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to say a word in behalf of this amendment, and I trust that I may prevail upon my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] not to insist on the point of order. Such an appropriation as this has been made, I think, three or four times heretofore, as perhaps gentlemen may remember. The beneficiary named in the amendment is the clerk detailed from the Pension Office to assist the Committee on Invalid Pensions in its work. The proposition contained in the amendment would make his pay equivalent to that of a per diem or session clerk of the House of Representatives.

He has been found by the committee, and I may say by the House, to be a very valuable aid in our work. He is a sort of oracle on pension matters here in the House, and as I know furnishes to members a great deal of valuable advice. In addition to that, he has charge of the Pension Office papers which are sent back and forth between the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Pension Office. He is thus required to make a great many trips, and is put to some extra expense.

This sort of an appropriation has been made heretofore in his behalf, and I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I regret to be obliged to insist upon this point of order; but in the absence of contrary instructions from the committee which I represent it would be improper for me not to make it. I would like to accommodate my friend from Indiana, as he knows.

This gentleman, however, to whom the amendment refers is in the regular employment of the Government; he is getting his salary as an employé in the Pension Bureau. I do not think he will resign or will suffer materially if this additional compensation be refused. Still, on the appeal of the gentleman from Indiana, I would waive this point if I dared to do so. But the committee expects me to make points of order wherever they can properly be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I move to amend by inserting, after the amendment last adopted, the following:

To pay to Howard A. Wiltberger $75 for forty-five days' work in the folding-room, and to Charles Brereton $158 for work in the folding-room.

Mr. BURNES. I make a point of order upon that amendment. I am willing to reserve it until the gentleman from Illinois can be heard.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to provide payment, as I understand, for work which these boys did in the last Congress. They were placed in the folding-room by Mr. Donelson and did the work to which they were assigned. I think there is no question raised on that point. The only difficulty was that the Doorkeeper at that time had no authority to put these boys to work. He did so, however, assuming that he had authority. The boys entered on their duties without knowing anything about the lack of authority on the part of the Doorkeeper, and they performed their work faithfully. One of them is now a page here and an intelligent and faithful boy.

Mr. HOLMAN. How many are there?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. It provides for the payment of two persons.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it ought to go in.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I know one of these boys. They have received no pay whatever for the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I do not know that the gentleman insisted upon the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask if they were paid anything at all.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. No, sir; they received no pay whatever for this work.

Mr. HOLMAN. But did they receive compensation for any work in which they were engaged?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. No, sir, I think not. I think they performed this work and it was found afterwards that the officer of the House had exceeded his power in authorizing it to be done; hence they could not be paid in the regular way. I hope the point of order will not be made.

Mr. BURNES. It seems that this does not come very regularly, nor has it been certified by any officer of the House. My friend will see the impropriety of making an appropriation under those circumstances; and while I regret exceedingly to be compelled to make the point of order, yet I feel it to be my duty to do it, as I have no authority from the committee to do otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must sustain the point of order if the gentleman insists upon it.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to have an amendment read?

Mr. BURNES. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I am directed by the Committee on Elections to offer the two amendments which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay JOHN M. GLOVER the sum of $2,000 in full of all expenses incurred by him in the contested-election case of Frank vs. Glover, in the Fiftieth Congress.

Also to pay to Nathan Frank the sum of $2,000 in full of all expenses incurred by him in the contested-election case of Frank vs. Glover in the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask if that covers the actual expenses to which these gentlemen have been subjected.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Neither of the appropriations here pays the entire expenses incurred by these gentlemen; but I understand that there is existing law which limits the amount in such cases to $2,000, regardless of what may have been the expense incurred.

Mr. REED. That existing law can be abrogated if the House sees proper to do so.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I suppose not on this appropriation bill.

Mr. REED. If nobody makes objection.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I am not authorized to report more than that by the Committee on Elections. That is the amount which has been allowed in all cases.

Mr. REED. I think there has been no greater wrong to individuals than that law.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I agree with the gentleman. I have suffered from it myself.

Mr. REED. It is a thorough injustice in every point of view.

Mr. O'FERRALL. The law limits the amount to $2,000. I can recollect an instance, and but one instance, where the amount has been exceeded. In the case of Massey vs. Wise, where there was a contest from the State of Virginia at large in the Forty-eighth Congress, there was a larger allowance made. But it has been the uniform rule of the committee to allow but $2,000 for expenses, and below that, even though the amount expended may have been largely in excess. If the sum of the expenses exceeded $2,000, the law only allowed that amount, but if they did not reach $2,000, the amount allowed was the sum of the expenses only.

Mr. REED. The gentleman does not know the amount expended here?

Mr. O'FERRALL. No, sir; but I think in each case it is considerably over $2,000.

Mr. REED. Every one who has ever had a contested-election case knows that neither the expense of prosecuting the contest nor of defending it is at the option of the member whose seat is contested. Under our present absurd system of taking evidence in contested-election cases and absurd method of deciding them, a man may be dragged all over his district and forced to pay out large sums of money, as high in one instance that I now recall as $8,000, and yet Congress by that law prevents him from receiving more than $2,000. It has had no tendency to lessen the amount of expenses, because that is a matter evidently beyond his control. It has been an outrage for a long time, and ought to be abrogated.

Mr. WEAVER. I want to say a word in order to bear testimony to the absolute accuracy of the statement made by the gentleman from Maine. I know from my personal knowledge of the facts the expenses which are entailed upon a man by these contests. I have had experience of it myself in a contest in my own State; and other members here know the same thing to be true, of being dragged all over the district and all over the State perhaps, sometimes out of a State, to ake testimony and then foot the bill out of your own pocket.

Mr. O'FERRALL. There are many living witnesses to the great wrongs which have been done under this law. I have felt it myself. In the Forty-eighth Congress I had a contest, and my expenses were over $4,200, for which I received but $2,000. I have asked no more since. The committee believe if more is granted in any case that it would open the door to a vast number of claims of this character and we would be flooded with applications for relief because of just such expenditures as that.

Mr. REED. We should pay no more in these election cases than the actual expense warrants, and the only proper method is to have the testimony taken in accordance with the rules of law. If we could have these election cases brought before a district judge for preliminary hearing, then, instead of the immense mass of testimony we now have, most of it utterly irrelevant, we should have the evidence contained within twenty-five pages. I had an election case once which resulted in a unanimous report of the Committee on Elections in my favor, and the unanimous action of the House. There was absolutely nothing to find out; and yet the testimony made a considerable bulk. I venture to say that if it had been taken before a district judge there would not have been twenty-five pages of legitimate testimony; and the same remark will apply in most of these contested-election cases. I call the attention of this House to the matter, because I hope at some time to present a bill on this subject, providing for a preliminary examination and preliminary disposition of these cases so that they will not be the discredit that they are to-day.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RETURN OF A SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the House a request from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, July 30, 1888.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 907) to provide for the erection of a public building at Charlotte, N. C., with an amendment of the Senate thereto.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request of the Senate will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. MILLS. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the hour for the daily meeting of the House be changed from 11 o'clock to 12 o'clock. [Applause.]

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. MILLS. I ask, by unanimous consent, that Monday, the 6th day of August, be set apart for the Committee on Labor. We took a day from them, and ought to give it back to them.

Mr. ROGERS. On the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], who is absent, unless you except from that the convict-labor bill I will object.

Mr. MILLS. I hope my friend will not do that, because we took that day from them and ought to return it.

Mr. ROGERS. I promised the gentleman from Alabama that if this exception were not made I should object, and I do so.

Mr. MILLS. I will ask that Tuesday, the 7th day of August, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS. I repeat my statement. I object unless the bill in regard to the transportation of the products of convict labor be excepted from the order.

Mr. MILLS. I can make no exception.

FOREIGN IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MCADOO, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 210) calling for information from American consuls in foreign countries relative to immigration to the United States and providing for an investigation as to alleged infraction of existing laws; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a privileged report, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 182) to provive for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments to the said bill, and agree to the same with the following amendments:

1. In third line, first page, strike out the words "proceedings in accordance with the laws of Nebraska" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or otherwise."

2. In tenth line, first page, after the word "dollars," insert "and the cost of said site shall not exceed the sum of $400,000."

And that the Senate agree to the same.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
JOHN MCSHANE,
ROBT. P. KENNEDY,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN C. SPOONER,
W. B. ALLISON,
G. G. VEST,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement of the House conferees, submitted under the rule, was read:

The managers on the part of the House on the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Omaha, Nebr., respectfully submit the following statement:

The Senate in the bill provided for $1,200,000 as the limit of cost for site and building. The House amended by substituting provision for a site only, not to exceed in cost $400,000. The effect of the conference report is to provide for a limit of $1,200,000 for site and building complete, and also that of this sum not more than $400,000 shall be expended for the site.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
JOHN MCSHANE,
ROBT. P. KENNEDY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House, in accordance with previous order, stands adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

The following petition indorsing the per diem rated service-pension bill, based on the principle of paying all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war a monthly pension of 1 cent a day for each day they were in the service, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

By Mr. BOOTHMAN: Of Samuel Scott and 159 other ex-Union soldiers of Clark County, Ohio.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 31, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. REAGAN presented the petition of P. H. Hinson and 23 other citizens of Madison and Grimes Counties, Texas, praying for the passage of additional amendments to the interstate-commerce act, prohibiting any railroad company from transporting commodities in cars belonging to the shipper, and giving fines imposed for violations of the interstate-commerce law to the informer; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of 32 citizens of Ohio, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Wallace County, Kansas, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HISCOCK, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 593) for the relief of James Albert Bonsack, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6753) for the relief of P. Gough Edelin, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8012) for the relief of M. M. Gibson, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1321) for the erection of a marine hospital at Evansville, Ind., reported it without amendment.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3829) for the relief of Wesley Montgomery, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (H. R. 6217) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands in Kansas;

A bill (S. 3390) to create the Lincoln land district in the Territory of New Mexico;

A bill (H. R. 9040) to confirm the homestead entry of Hugh Foster; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 14) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to certify lands to the State of Kansas for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil bill, and moved its reference to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 925) for the relief of Matthew W. Berryman, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I report from the Committee on Manufactures favorably an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment printed?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I presume it is not necessary to have it printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK read as follows:

It is provided that any surplus arising from appropriations made to either of the Departments by act of May 28, 1888, for participation in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley, may be transferred and used for the same purposes to participate in the expositions to be held in the cities of Augusta, Ga., and Richmond, Va., which are to begin in the month of October of the present year.

ELLIOTT JOHNSTON.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 8285) to remove the political disabilities of Elliott Johnston, and as usual in such cases, as it saves time, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 3, after the words "that the," to strike out "legal and;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, by reason of participation in the late rebellion, be, and they hereby are, removed from Elliott Johnston, of Accomac County, in the State of Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Select Committee on the President's Message transmitting the Report of the Pacific Railway Commission, to submit a report, accompanied by a bill.

The bill (S. 3401) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and to provide for a settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain of said railroads, and to secure to the United States the payment of all indebtedness of certain of the companies therein mentioned, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say a word in relation to the report.

The bill now reported is the Outhwaite bill as reported to the House of Representatives, containing many amendments over the bill as it came from the commission originally. The report made in the Senate is signed by all the members of the committee. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] being absent he authorized the chairman of the committee by a telegram to sign the report for him.

The bill relates only to the Union Pacific and Central Branch, having nothing whatever to do with the Central Pacific.

The committee find much greater difficulty in formulating an adjustment and a settlement with the Central Pacific than with the Union Pacific, and are not prepared at the present time to make any report touching that road. It is barely possible that it may be necessary to amend this bill when it is under consideration.

The bill provides for finding the present worth of the debt of the United States against this corporation, and I desire that a statement of the processes may be printed in the RECORD. I will read it. It is as follows:

STATEMENT MADE TO EXPLAIN THE METHOD OF FIGURING ADOPTED IN THE PROPOSED BILL.

Under the actions of 1862 and 1864, the Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific Railroad Companies received the bonds of the United States, payable in thirty years and bearing 6 per cent. interest to the amount of $33,539,512. The interest on these for thirty years is $60,371,121.60; making the total sum which the United States bound itself to pay for the companies $93,910,633.60. This sum, except as herein stated, is under the decision of the Supreme Court, not due from the companies till the maturity of the bonds, say July 8, 1897.

The original acts required certain payments, namely, one-half the amount earned by transportation for the Government and 5 per cent. of the net earnings, and these payments are made annually. These payments to June 0, 1888, amount to $15,980,652.10. As nearly as can be estimated the future payments of the same kind would average each year $675,000.

With these data the position of the debt may be stated thus: The United States on July 1, 18-8, was in the position of a creditor who holds a note for $93,-910,633.60, upon which was paid $15,980,652.10, leaving a balance of $77,929,981.50 of which $675,000 is payable at the end of each year for eight years and the balance is payable at the end of nine years, or July 8, 1897.

If the debtor wishes to pay the entire debt in cash now, i. e., nine years before it is due, he is entitled to a discount. The amount of this discount should be such that the creditor taking his money and investing it at the current rate of interest would at the maturity of the debt have in his hands a sum exactly equal to the debt then due. As the United States can easily get 3 per cent. on its money this rate is adopted, and as the interest on an investment is payable semi-annually the discount should be made with semi-annual rests. Or, to put it in another way, as the debtor under the proposed settlement instead of paying cash is to give his bonds and pay interest on them semi-annually, it is only fair that the interest should be allowed on the same principle, which is adopted in charging it.

If, however, the entire debt were discounted with semi-annual rests for nine years, the Government would lose the advantage of interest on the annual payments of $675,000 to which it is entitled by its contract. To avoid this injustice the discount is made without rests, whereby an injustice is done the debtor to the extent of more than a million dollars, as the following tables show:

Table 1 gives the result of fixing the present worth by discounting at compound interest with semi-annual rests and without making any allowance for the annual payments of $675,000.

Table 2 gives the result where the discount is made in the same way, but proper allowance is made for the annual payments.

Table 3 gives the result where the discount is made at simple interest, as in the proposed bill.

	Table 1.	Table 2.	Table 3.
Principal of bonds	$33,539,512.00	$33,539,512.00	$33,539,512.00
Interest for thirty years at 6 per cent	60,371,121.60	60,371,121.60	60,371,121.60
Total	93,910,633.60	93,910,633.60	93,910,633.60
Payments on bond and interest account to June 30, 1888 (payment for last year estimated)	15,980,652.10	15,980,652.10	15,980,652.10
Balance	77,929,981.50	77,929,981.50	77,929,981.50
Present worth of this sum on June 30, 1888	59,570,452.00	60,212,904.12	61,351,634.00
Sinking fund June 30, 1888 (estimated)	8,399,503.67	8,399,503.67	8,399,503.67
Balance for which bonds and mortgage are proposed	51,170,948.33	51,813,400.45	52,952,130.33

In other words, if the annual payments are ignored and a fair discount made, there is an error against the United States of $642,552.12. By adopting the plan of simple discount this error is corrected, and the company is overcharged $1,138,729.88.

The actuaries of the New York life-insurance companies have been requested to take this matter and see whether, without too much complication of statement, they can arrive at a statement which shall be exactly fair to the company and to the Government, and it is barely possible, if that statement comes, that the committee may wish to offer it as an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar and the report will be printed.

Mr. FRYE, from the Select Committee on the President's Message transmitting the Report of the Pacific Railway Commission, to whom were referred the following memorials and resolutions favoring the passage of what is known as the Outhwaite Union Pacific funding bill, asked that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they lie on the table; which was agreed to:

Resolutions of Board of Trade of Pierce, Nebr.;

Resolutions of the Oakley (Kans.) Board of Trade;

Two memorials and joint resolutions of the Board of Trade of the city of Stromsburgh, Nebr.;

Memorial and resolutions of the Board of Trade of South Omaha, Nebr.;

Memorial of the village trustees of Pierce, Nebr.;

Resolutions of the Omaha Board of Trade of Omaha, Nebr.;

Preamble and resolutions of the Omaha (Nebr.) Board of Trade;

Resolutions of the Board of Trade of Council Bluffs, Iowa;

Resolutions of the Board of Trade of Atchison, Kans.; and Resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Lawrence, Kans.

GEORGE W. SEAVER.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] July 30, 1888, to pay to the widow of George W. Seaver, late a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, an amount equal to six months' salary, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Mrs. N. S. Seaver, widow of George W. Seaver, deceased, late a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, an amount equal to six months' salary as such clerk aforesaid; said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

RELATIONS WITH CANADA.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] July 24, 1888, to report it with an amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of seven Senators be appointed by the Chair whose duty it shall be to report upon the relations of commerce and business existing between the United States and the dependencies of Great Britain in North America, including the effect upon the commerce and carrying trade of the United States of the Canadian system of railways and canals now existing and in contemplation, and the prospect of the displacement of any existing industries of the United States by industries established there; also whether the obligations of existing treaties and of international law are and have been observed by the said dependencies toward the people of the United States, and the number, amount, and character of the existing claims against Great Britain by reason of the violation of such obligations toward the people of the United States in said dependencies.

Said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a clerk, messenger, and stenographer, and to sit anywhere in the United States during the session and during the recess of Congress.

Any subcommittee by them appointed may exercise the same powers as the full committee.

The amendment reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was to add to the resolution:

And all necessary expenses of such committee or subcommittee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers duly approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I ought to make one observation in regard to the resolution which has just been passed.

The resolution comprehends in its terms the matter of the railroad relations, but I understand the Committee on Interstate Commerce propose to take up that subject and to discuss it. It is not, therefore, my purpose to engage in that particular department or in any way to interfere with the proposed investigation by that committee.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to say that the Interstate Commerce Committee, by the consent of the Senate, expect to enter upon a thorough investigation of the relations between the United States and Canada connected with the subject of transportation both by rail and water; and it was only on account of an understanding with the Senator from Massachusetts that I made no objection to the passage of the resolution just adopted.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate Senate bill 288, which has been returned from the House of Representatives with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SPOONER, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. DANIEL were appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (S. 3402) for the relief of John M. Harrell, of the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3403) for the relief of S. S. Stearns; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLODGETT introduced a bill (S. 3404) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint commissioners to investigate certain claims for damages done to planted oysters in Raritan Bay in 1881; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PALMER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 907) to provide for the erection of a public building at Charlotte, N. C.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10540, being the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to make an appropriation for the erection of a public building at Atchison, Kans.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask leave to report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds an amendment to the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. The pending amendment is the amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs leave to state about that amendment, that it was perhaps improvidently announced as agreed to before the point of order had been submitted. The Senator from Kentucky stating that he desired to submit a question of order upon the various amendments proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, the Chair asks that the announcement made may be reconsidered, by unanimous consent, for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Kentucky to interpose the point of order. If there be no objection, that order will be taken.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make the point of order that it is legislation upon an appropriation bill; that it is not the law of the land that a building should be erected at that point at present. I do not know what other grounds there are, but I object to the amendment that it is not proper to go on the pending bill, and I desire to state the reasons why I object if I may be allowed to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state to the Senator from Kentucky that, properly speaking, the point of order is not debatable.

Mr. BECK. I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Kentucky will be allowed to proceed. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BECK. I desire to state the only object I had in view in interposing the objection——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Do I understand that there is to be general debate on the point of order, or that only one side is to be heard?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no doubt that if one side is heard the Senate will permit the other to be heard also.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair again state the point which is raised?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky interposes a point of order upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, which was pending when the Senate adjourned last evening.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, all I desire to say is that I am not making this objection or point of order, whatever it may be considered, because of any hostility to the bill as an independent proposition. There are a number of bills which have passed the Senate for public buildings in which I have acquiesced and believe they ought to become laws, at least I know of nothing to the contrary, notably one, as I said yesterday, has great merit, being for a post-office in the city of San Francisco. They are occupying there an old post-office building which I understand was built when San Francisco was hardly more than a village, while now it is a great city. They ought to have a suitable post-office building, of course. But the bill for that purpose has not passed both Houses, and is therefore not a law.

The Committee on Appropriations inserted in this bill, as I understand, provision for every public building where a bill authorizing it has become a law. We have not inserted such provisions where the bills have not passed both Houses and been signed by the President.

I will state the reason I have for apprehending serious complication if we insert such an amendment as is now proposed on the sundry civil appropriation bill, which it is well known must pass, as it provides for the ordinary running of the Government. By this bill the Light-House Service, the Life-Saving Service, and a great many important works and indispensable services are provided for, so that the sundry civil bill must become a law or the Government can not be run in an orderly way. Now, the proposition to attach Senate bills for public buildings which are not yet laws, which the House has not had a chance to consider—at least, we have a right to assume that it has not—and which the President has had no chance to examine, is simply for the Senate to say that hereafter, not merely on this bill, but in all time to come, the rule of the Senate shall be that whenever it passes a bill for a public building or for any other local matter that is not general legislation, no matter how important, it will attach it to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and force the House to act upon it and agree to it or that the bill shall not pass. The effect will be to force the President to sign the bill whether he objects to the particular appropriation for public buildings or not. The decision in this case, in my opinion, will settle that question now and for all time to come. I confess to an earnest desire to avoid complications of that sort.

Therefore, I went to Mr. Smith, the superintendent of the document-room, this morning in a hurried way and obtained from him a list of bills which have passed the Senate at this session, most of which are now pending in the House of Representatives. The list may not be accurate; I think some of the bills have been passed; but the list that he gave me, which I made a note of, runs up to a very large sum of money—$9,723,000, besides two or three other bills running up to about $350,000 more that he said he could not tell exactly what had become of. I then went to the House of Representatives to see how many of those bills had passed, taking the Senate list with me. The Clerk of the House advised me that all he could find which had passed the House was one at Tallahassee, Fla., $75,000; one at Omaha, Nebr.; one at Wichita, Kansas, $100,000; one at Newark, N. J., $350,000; one at Sacramento, Cal., $50,000; one at Youngstown, Ohio, $75,000, which was vetoed; one at Charlotte, N. C., $85,000; and one at Milwaukee, Wis., $300,000.

The list of Senate bills which was furnished me by the superintendent of our document-room is as follows:

S. 20, custom-house, Portland, Oregon	$350,000

S. 2789, post-office, Reno, Nev	60,000
Grand total	9,723,000

This list of bills, furnished me from our document-room, as I said, runs up to about $9,723,000, of which perhaps bills to the amount of a million dollars have been agreed to in the House of Representatives, and there may be two or three bills now in the sundry civil bill embraced in the list, for I have not had time to revise it; some may have passed both Houses which carried their own appropriations with them. The list shows enough to make good what I say about the complications the insertion of any of these measures into this will lead to, because I assume that if any one is inserted all will be; as all have passed the Senate, and are therefore on an equal footing. I repeat that in my opinion attaching all or any of these public building bills of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill, before they have been acted upon by the House and before they have been examined by the President, simply because they have passed the Senate, is not good legislation; that it tends to produce discord between the two Houses. I fear that it will be regarded in the other end of the Capitol as an invasion of their rights and as an attempt to coerce them to pass these bills simply because the Senate has done so. There is enough of that sort of feeling always growing up between the two Houses in Congress and in all other legislative bodies to make it well to avoid it whenever we can.

It may be that the House of Representatives have not done what we think they ought to have done, but that is not our business. They have a right to do what they please, and we have no right, in my judgment, to try to force them to do anything they do not want to do, whether we like or dislike their action; and I claim the same rights for the Senate that I accord to the House.

The sundry-civil appropriation bill provides for carrying out existing laws and for executing and perfecting measures which have been already provided for. That we have done in regard to public buildings in every instance, and I think we have done it well. We have done it better than the House did, because in all the small appropriations for buildings costing $100,000 and less we have inserted in this bill the full amount necessary to erect the building. The House had confined the appropriation to one-half, but we thought it was more economical to do it in the way we have proposed, making the contracts all at once and finishing it in one year instead of two, and we have adopted that rule.

If we enter upon the wide field now proposed I do not see where we are to stop.

I assume that every one of those forty or fifty bills which passed the Senate has as much right to go on this bill as the one now proposed. The technical steps may not have been taken, they may not have been referred to the Committee on Appropriations for one day, but they can all be referred this morning and be in order to-morrow morning, and I presume from our experience yesterday, when we consumed all day on a single item relating to the irrigation of public lands, we can run all this day on some other question.

The Committee on Finance, I understand, proposes to offer the direct-tax bill as an amendment to this bill; that will add, if it passes, $17,000,000 more. The bill itself now appropriates some $25,000,000 or $26,000,000; the direct-tax bill will make it about $42,000,000; and now from $7,000,000 to $10,000,000 more are to be added for public buildings. This bill alone before we get through with it, if we keep on as we are doing, will contain appropriations of larger sums of money than ever were expended in most if not all of the years of Mr. Buchanan's administration for all the purposes of the Government.

As I said, whether the proper steps have been taken in regard to all the public-building bills or not, it can be done this morning in five minutes, and they will all be in order to-morrow and they will all be attached to the bill. It is no excuse to say that some Senators failed to take the proper steps while others have taken the proper steps by referring the amendments to the Committee on Appropriations. I suppose this particular building has no more merit than any other building. It has as much as most of them perhaps; it has not as much as the San Francisco building, which I suppose will follow, though the necessary steps may not have been taken to make it in order by a reference to the Committee on Appropriations. But, if it is not, it can be done in one day.

Having stated my objections I shall ask, with all respect to the Chair, a vote of the Senate and a call of the yeas and nays to determine whether we propose to establish a precedent like this and are going to make for all time every public-building bill that has passed the Senate that the House refuses to consider, or fails to consider, or that the President has not had a chance to see, or has failed to act upon, or has vetoed, part of the great sundry civil appropriation bills which must pass in order that the Government may be carried on properly, decently, and in order. I do not believe in forcing the present or any other House of Representatives or the President of the United States—either the present President or any other President—because whatever precedent we set now is going to apply to all time, to pass or approve Senate bills. I insist that the President shall have the opportunity of passing upon the propriety or impropriety of every measure which this or the other House may propose.

Mr. SPOONER. It may be, Mr. President, that the rule ought to be amended in accordance with the reasoning and the policy indicated by the Senator from Kentucky so as to place it absolutely beyond question that no such amendment shall be made by the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill. But as I understand it, the question now pending is whether this amendment is in order under an existing rule of the Senate, and the other questions, as to whether the amendment shall be adopted if the Chair shall decide it to be in order, are to be debated hereafter.

The Senator from Kentucky makes the point of order, I understand, that the amendment is not in order because no law has been passed providing for the construction of a public building at Atchison, Kans. It seems to me there can be no question as to the amendment being in order under the rule. While I have been in the Senate but a comparatively short time, I remember that the rule was construed by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] while he occupied the chair as the President pro tempore of the Senate to render admissible an amendment like the one which is now pending.

In order to enable the Senate to place an amendment of this kind on the sundry civil appropriation bill the rule does not require that a law shall have already been passed, which involves, of course, that a bill shall have passed both Houses and that it shall have been approved by the President. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the language of Rule XVI:

1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill, the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill—

That, of course, is not this case—

or to add a new item of appropriation—

That is this case—

unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law—

The Senator argues as if that were the end of the rule, but it is not—

or—

The disjunctive "or" is used, it will be observed—treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session—

That is not all—

or—

Which is this case—

unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

As I said to the Senate yesterday, this amendment is moved by direction of a standing committee of the Senate—the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The rule dealing with the details, subdivision 2 of it, is as follows:

2. All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation, shall, at least one day before they are considered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The rule in this respect was complied with, so that as to this amendment it stands thus——

Mr. BECK. Go on a little further. Read on.

Mr. SPOONER. I will get to that in a moment. It stands thus: It is offered by direction of a standing committee which reported it favorably to the Senate with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and it was referred to that committee twenty-four hours before the time arrived for its consideration. The only other point made by the Senator from Kentucky is that this is new legislation.

Mr. BECK. Read on down.

Mr. SPOONER. I will read on down.

In like manner amendments proposing new items of appropriation to river and harbor bills shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Commerce; also amendments to bills establishing post-roads, proposing new post-roads, shall, before being considered, be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Of course that does not relate to or bear upon this question. Now I read from subdivision 3:

3. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received.

Mr. BECK. What I contend is that it is general legislation, no matter who rules to the contrary.

Mr. SPOONER. That, as I understand it, is the Senator's main point. The Chair will observe that this does not inhibit an amendment which constitutes new legislation. The Senate, although perhaps to follow the Senator from Kentucky it ought to do so, has not seen fit thus far to so tie its hands as to preclude it from putting new legislation upon an appropriation bill. New legislation is not prohibited. General legislation is prohibited.

Then the Senator from Kentucky argued to the Senate that this amendment providing for the erection of a public building at Atchison, Kans., whose force is spent when the appropriation is expended, is general legislation within the meaning of that rule. This question has been under debate before, and it has been decided in the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Both ways, too.

Mr. SPOONER. It has been decided one way which it seems to me is in accordance with reason, and in a way that I venture to say no Senator can successfully attack.

In 1884—and I discuss this question now, not only with reference to this amendment, but with reference to some which are to follow it—in 1884, when the naval appropriation bill was pending, an amendment was offered to it providing for the construction of two new cruisers, and connected with the mere item of appropriation was a considerable amount of legislation, providing how the contract should be let, and the amendment contained certain prohibitions upon the action of the Secretary of the Navy. The point was made that it was new and general legislation within the meaning of the rule. I believe the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was the occupant of the chair at that time, and I desire, if the Senator from Kentucky will give attention, to read—it is very brief—his decision upon the point. I submit to the Senator that his definition of general legislation is absolutely accurate and in every way defensible. He said:

The Chair has examined the Journals—

I believe the Senator from Kentucky had the honor to make the point of order at that time against the amendment proposing the construction of the two cruisers—

The Chair has examined the Journals as to analogous amendments at former sessions, and finds himself, as he thinks, fully supported. The distinction is a very broad and obvious one between the general legislation named in the rule and a provision of this character. "General legislation," in the general sense (there are exceptions, however), is legislation that is permanent and regulates the conduct of affairs, and does not exhaust itself of its own force, as every item or provision in appropriation bills properly does.

This amendment is to provide for doing an act which when once done the statutory part of it is entirely exhausted and the law is no longer in force; it has been executed. That is widely different from a regulation even in respect of the conduct of officers of the Navy, which regulation would be a general provision that would continue in force until repealed. The Chair therefore thinks, however great the enactment of the subject is, that within the rule it is in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

This item of appropriation for the construction of a public building at Atchison proposes to appropriate $75,000. The remainder of the amendment is a simple direction by Congress as to the expenditure of the money, and when the money shall have been expended the law is exhausted, it is executed, it is the end of it. It never becomes a part of the permanent law of the country. It is not in any sense, I submit, general legislation within the meaning of the rule.

The Senator has said (it does not bear at all on the question of order, but h may refer to it for a moment) that if this amendment is in order it is In order to attach by amendment to the bill every public-building biill which has passed the Senate. If my construction of the rule is a correct one, it was within the power of Senators to make in order every public-building bill which has passed the Senate and has not passed the Houseof Representatives, but Senators have not chosen to avail themselves o f the rules in that respect.

Mr. BECK. Why not do it this morning?

Mr. SPOONER. I doubt if it could be done this morning.

Mr. BECK. It is required to be done within twenty-four hours.

Mr. SPOONER. I have supposed that the bill would probably be acted upon to-day. But at any rate the amendments, and they are very few, which I propose to offer to the bill were offered under the rule, by standing committee favorably reporlted, and it seems to me they are in order.

Mr. DAWES. In that connection I should like to inquire of the Senator, as he, I observe, offered these amendments, by what rule did he make his selection?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Wisconsin made no selection.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator offered out of the number a series of amendments.

Mr. SPOONER. The amendments offered by Senators were reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. DAWES. I was under the impression that the Senator offered the amendments himself.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no; I have no interest in the amendments.

Mr. DAWES. Then my inquiry is not pertinent.

Mr. SPOONER. I have offered no amendment for Wisconsin.

Mr. DAWES. I did not say the Senator had. I did not mean to be impertinent. The Senator knows I did not intend that.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, I know that.

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator from Wisconsin sits down, I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. I hold in my hand sixty-six bills, if I have counted them correctly, which have passed the Senate, providing for public buildings. He says he is going to offer only a very few of these. Is there any one of these sixty-six bills which has passed the Senate which does not stand upon an equal footing and have the same right that the bill he has now offered as the pending amendment?

Mr. SPOONER. I think very few of the sixty-six bills have been put into shape to be in order as amendments to this bill.

Mr. BECK. The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has them all under his control, and if he had taken the same steps with any one of the sixty-six that he has with these they would all be in order, would they not?

Mr. SPOONER. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has not of its own motion, as originating with it, reported a single amendment to this bill. Every amendment which the committee has reported as an amendment to this bill has been offered by some Senator as intended to be proposed as an amendment to this bill, and referred to that committee and reported by it upon that reference.

Mr. BECK. Then the committee with sixty-six bills, as I count them, as I see them enumerated on the Calendar, only reports back such as some vigilant Senator sees fit to hand them, and all the others who are not so vigilant will lose their bills.

Mr. SPOONER. It has reported back only those amendments which the Senate itself has referred to that committee and has charged that committee with acting upon. That committee has acted upon the order of the Senate. I can not see, however, that the number of bills has anything to do with the proper construction of the rules.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has no authority to report an amendment, unless that amendment has been referred to the committee and reported as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. VEST. I want in justice to myself to make a single observation about this amendment in a prefatory way. I wish to say that I have very little regard for the ruling of the Senate as to points of order upon amendments to general appropriation bills. In fact my ten years' experience here has taught me one lesson, if no other, and that is that the rules of order always give way to party exigencies or to individual wishes. I have never known a case yet in which the plainest rule could not be set aside on a point of order if the legislation which was in view met with the approval of a majority of the Senate. That has been invariably the case. Therefore I do not rise so much to discuss the point of order as to make some other remarks on this amendment.

As a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I have been solicited—I use the word in the parliamentary sense—I have been solicited by various Senators and Representatives to agree that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should recommend as amendments to the sundry civil bill certain public building appropriations. My response has always been, and I declare it now here openly, that any action of the Senate which did not put upon the general appropriation bill all the public buildings would be unjust and improper. There is no reason, there is no justice in taking any one bill or any number of bills, singling them out, and putting them as amendments upon the appropriation bill. If one single appropriation for a public building—I mean, of course, those which have only passed the Senate, and not the House of Representatives—shall be put on this bill, I intend to insist that every one of them in that condition shall be put on.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does he insist that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, after having reported a bill for the erection of a public building at some designated point, that bill having passed the Senate, still has any jurisdiction of that subject, so that it could, without any order of the Senate, without the introduction of an amendment or a new bill, of its own motion report that proposition as an amendment to the sundry civil bill?

Mr. VEST. I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. SPOONER. Take this amendment. A bill was introduced in the Senate for the erection of a public building at Atchison. It was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That committee acted upon it and instructed a favorable report upon it. It passed the Senate. Does the Senator claim that that committee might to-day, if it saw fit, report another bill on that subject—that there is anything on that subject within the jurisdiction of the committee?

Mr. VEST. I do not see how that affects the proposition I am discussing.

Mr. SPOONER. It affects the right of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report as amendments to this bill all the bills which have been before it.

Mr. VEST. I do not see any relevancy in what the Senator says to what I am debating. I simply say, as a matter of parliamentary right——

Mr. BECK. Before the Senator goes on, I should like to ask a question. I do not profess to be a parliamentarian——

Mr. SPOONER. Nor do I.

Mr. BECK. I know half a dozen pages in both Houses who are better parliamentarians than any Senator or Representative. I have not, therefore, any particular relu ctance in confessing that I do not know anything about the subject. But after a bill has passed the Senate and passed at this session, do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that it is in order when it comes back to his committee to be acted upon favorably by that committee again, and be sent to the Committee on Appropriations as an amendment to an appropriation bill?

Mr. SPOONER. Every one of these amendments has been again offered in the Senate and referred by the Senate to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and reported from that committee as an amendment proposed to be offered to this bill, and that has been the practice for years.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, that is of no consequence compared to the real question before the Senate——

Mr. SPOONER. I beg pardon of the Senator for interrupting him.

Mr. VEST. The question before the Senate to-day is not a point of order, but whether we shall put these public-building bills, these appropriations for public buildings, upon a general appropriation bill and coerce the House of Representatives into passing these bills.

Now, I do not claim any extraordinary disinterestedness, but I speak simply here as a Senator in the discharge of a very plain duty, to my mind. I hold in my hand a bill which passed the Senate months ago for a public building in the city where I reside, one of the first that passed the Senate, at an expense of $1,200,000, and went to the House of Representatives, and there it is doomed for some reason and has not been heard of since. Other bills have come back, but this bill is there yet. Does any Senator expect me to sit silent here and permit other amendments in the shape of appropriations to go on this bill without being just to my constituency—without offering this as an amendment also? Do I expect any other Senator to do it? In plain language, if we put on one of these bills we must put on all, and I insist upon it, and that means an increase in the aggregate on this sundry civil bill of over $7,000,000. Any other course would be unjust, and I give notice now that it will not be done; not one or five or ten of these bills will be put upon this bill as amendments without the Senate voting on all and each of them separately as amendments. That is all I propose to say about it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, there is a distinction which ought to be drawn here that does not seem to have occurred to the Senator from Kentucky or the Senator from Missouri; and when the Senator from Missouri serves notice that no five or six of these bills shall be passed as amendments or passed upon as amendments to this appropriation bill without considering all the public-building bills, he simply serves notice that he intends to do what he is advising us against—to violate the rules of the Senate.

There are two provisions under which we can offer these bills as amendments to this appropriation bill. The one is the clause which says that all bills which have passed the Senate may be offered as amendments. The other clause is that all amendments which are properly reported from a standing committee of the Senate may be voted upon and passed as part of this sundry civil appropriation bill.

The difference between the amendment offered and the bill which the Senator from Missouri proposes to offer and insists upon having passed is this: Bills which are to be offered as amendments by the Senator from Wisconsin are no longer bills. They were bills and as such passed. Then they were taken and the entire part from the line "In the Senate of the United States," down to and including the enacting clause, was stricken out, and the rest of it was offered in this printed form as an amendment, just as if it had been written with pen and ink. It was offered here under the rules, referred to a standing committee of the Senate, and by that committee reported back to the Senate again in the form the Senate was asked to act upon it. The committee acted upon it as an amendment to this bill, not as a bill itself, but as an amendment to an appropriation bill, and if the President of the Senate will look at the amendments he will find them in that form. I speak not as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but I speak as one who prepared some of these amendments, who presented them to the Senate two days ago, and they have been acted upon as far as any personal industry could do it by that committee, and been brought back here under the rules of the Senate, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and by that committee reported back to the Senate. For that reason they occupy here a very different position from the bill of the Senator from Missouri which he says yet slumbers in a committee elsewhere. Is his a bill? But there are bills that have gone to the House of Representatives that represent these bills, but as they come here now they are amendments offered within the last two days, reported upon by a standing committee, then by the Committee on Appropriations, and are within the purview of two principles laid down in the rules that govern amendments to appropriation bills.

Now, sir, if there be any partisan business in this I do not understand it. I say if I undertake to take another chance of passing a bill and bring it within the rules of this body it is my privilege to do it, and it ill becomes a Senator to say that it is done for partisan purposes and to the neglect of bills of other Senators. I undertake to repeat that we have no bills there to put on the appropriation bill. We have amendments there, and each of these amendments is simply the printed copy of the bill with all that constituted it a bill stricken from it. If it had been rewritten and entered here there certainly could have been no objection. Those Senators who left their bills in committee, who did not undertake to bring amendments in here in lieu of their bills and offer them, have no right to complain of us, and have no right furthermore to censure either the committee or those who have been more industrious than they themselves, or possibly less neglectful than they themselves of the interests which they are here to represent.

I say that distinction ought to be noted, and especially in view of the criticism that has been passed upon this action by the Senator from Kentucky. He says there are sixty-six of these bills and sixty of them he knows can be brought in here. All of those that are in the committee as bills can not be brought in, only those that are there as amendments can be put upon this bill, and they have been passed upon by a standing committee and then in turn by the Committee on Appropriations.

If you want to find where the partisan part of this debate comes in you will find it in the speech of the Senator from Kentucky; you will find it in that reference to the possibility, as he says, of bringing in here sixty-six bills, when that Senator ought to know that it is not possible to do it unless the Senate would itself annul all the rules that relate to this entire matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not rise to debate this question of order, for I think it is a question that has been settled. I have no doubt at all that this is clearly within the rules of order. Each committee of this body has a right to offer a new item of appropriation referred to it and send it to the Committee on Appropriations; and the "legislation" referred to in the rule is general legislation, not special legislation relating to the particular item of appropriation. That has been settled so often that it is not worth while to discuss it.

My object in rising is to state that I can not, with my sense of fair play, vote for any of these public buildings, singled out and offered as amendments to an appropriation bill. As a class of legislation it is vicious to the last degree. The general idea of a general appropriation is that there should be no matter in it except that which is to be provided for by existing law; and I should vote for a rule, absolute and peremptory, not to allow in any case any item of appropriation in a general appropriation bill that was not provided for by existing law. That is not the general rule of the Senate, because it does provide for new items of appropriation to be reported from the different standing committees.

But the injustice of this proceeding is very marked indeed. The Senator from Wisconsin offers certain amendments that some Senators have sent to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and he reports them to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and in that way makes them legal, so that they are proper amendments; but would it be right and fair and just to select these amendments from the mass of propositions in regard to public buildings and put them on a general appropriation bill and say to the President, "You shall not veto these items, although they are not provided for by existing law; we take away from you your constitutional power to object to the passage of a bill."

Mr. SPOONER. We can vote it down.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I propose to do. We ought either to make this thing a general matter by postponing it until to-morrow and let the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds take out those public buildings that they think are of vital importance and ought properly be put on as amendments to the appropriation bill, and then put them on. But to select three or four or five or six among the least important and force them upon this bill is not only unusual, but I think it is unfair—not unfair in the sense of referring to the conduct of any member here, but unfair as between the several representatives of these various propositions.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me a word in that connection I will say that I do not know who has made any selection of bills. This committee has reported no bills and no amendments to the pending bill which were not introduced by Senators as amendments intended to be offered to this bill which have not as such been referred by the Senate to the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I exonerate the Senator from Wisconsin from making any preferences or selections. He has only taken the amendments sent to him; but is it right that individual Senators should take out their particular bills, especially those that have not been finally acted on heretofore, and bring them in here and put them on a general appropriation bill and thus give them an advantage over other bills that every Senator here would vote for?

Mr. SPOONER. The only one of the amendments in my hand which has not been acted upon by the Senate before is one from the Senator's own State.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is it ought not to be put on this bill. I would not vote for it; but I will tell you what I will do. I would put the vetoed bills on immediately if they are strong cases, if they are as meritorious as they are. There are bills in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds now from my own State. Why should not they be offered as amendments to this bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg pardon for making a sotto voce remark. I said they were not in order. The vetoed bills, if passed at all, must be passed by a two-thirds majority, whereas on the rest of the bills it is sufficient to have a simple majority to pass them.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senate is justified in taking up new propositions not provided for by existing law and putting them on this bill to prevent a veto, it is clearly also justified in putting them on as amendments to this bill in order to avoid a veto. Now, take those two vetoed bills. They were passed unanimously by both Houses; bills in regard to Youngstown and Zanesville, Ohio. The veto, speaking respectfully of the President, is utterly without cause in my judgment. No more meritorious bills have been passed here. They received unanimous votes in both Houses of Congress. Shall they be ignored and no effort made to pass those bills because the President has sent his vetoes here? When you take up a proposition that has not been considered in either House to erect a public building, and especially when it is proposed to take a great number of bills which have passed the Senate, and which the House has refused to consider, and attach them to this appropriation bill—is that right? Is it proper legislation for us to put a mass of these propositions on this bill and say to the other House, "Take these at the risk of defeating your sundry civil bill, involving twenty or thirty millions of the most important expenditures of the Government?" It is not wise legislation, unless the thing is made general. Unless the Senate makes up its mind that it will put on this bill appropriations for all the public buildings which it thinks are proper to be passed we ought not to do it in particular cases.

There is one for my own State proposed here, introduced by my colleague. I do not think it is fair and just to put through the provision in regard to Canton when we refuse to do it in regard to places like Youngstown and Zanesville.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will allow me to suggest that the Youngstown bill can be called up at any time. It has passed both Houses, and the Senate can be called upon under the Constitution to vote upon the President's veto of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. But we know how difficult it is to get a vote of two-thirds over a veto. Although those bills passed both Houses unanimously, yet if there should be an effort made to pass them over the President's veto we know what is the common fate of such bills. One or two have escaped, I believe, even that ordeal, but only one or two. On the other hand, you take these bills which have not been acted upon in the two Houses, some of which have not been acted upon in either House, and put them on here and give them the privilege of avoiding the President's veto, compelling him to sign them nolens volens because he can not afford to defeat the passage of this great measure affecting great Departments of the Government.

It is not fair legislation. If we are going to do it with regard to any, we ought to take out the bills we should stand by in regard to public buildings and put them on as amendments. It is very easy to do that. Half a dozen Senators here ask that this bill go over until to-morrow for that purpose. No public interest is involved by postponing the bill until to-morrow. You do not hasten the passage of the bill an hour by refusing to put it over till to-morrow. It will not hasten our adjournment an hour to push it now. By that we can make the amendments proper and in order. But is it right, because certain Senators get an advantage, to put in their appropriations for public buildings and get them on this bill where the President can not veto them? And that is the case of buildings bills for which have not been passed by both Houses. It is not right. Therefore, I do not care whether it comes from my State or any other State, I shall vote against any proposition of this kind unless it is made general; and if a point of order is made, the bill will have to lie over until to-morrow, although I do not believe that any Senator in view of the facts would make a point of order in order to give an advantage to particular bills over others. Then let the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, if they will, select out from among those bills that the House refused to present for action those which are important.

Mr. SPOONER. They have gone from that committee; they have been acted upon by that committee; they have been reported by that committee; they have passed the Senate; they are even beyond the jurisdiction of this body unless they are introduced by way of amendment to appropriation bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have a right as an original force, under the rules of the Senate, to report any bills in regard to public buildings and grounds; and if the Senate has passed certain bills which they have reported heretofore and they think it wise instead of depending on the ordinary course of legislation to get their bills through on an appropriation bill, if they think it is justifiable under the circumstances to put those bills in the form of amendments to this appropriation bill, they have a perfect right to do so, just as the Committee on Finance or any other committee of this body has a right to report an original bill.

I think it is unfair to take up these measures in the way now proposed. It is said there will be less than a million dollars involved in the committee's amendments that are proposed and now fixed up for presentation, but at the same time you ignore probably eight or nine million dollars of appropriation for public buildings, almost any one of which is more important than the most important of those proposed to-day in the last hours of the session. I say it is not right; it is not the right way to do it, and I shall vote against these amendments on their merits without regard to the point of order.

Mr. DANIEL. I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] rather misapprehends the scope of the amendment which has been reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. He gives us notice that if these amendments are insisted upon he proposes to take the whole body of public-building bills which have passed this body and march them as a battalion into this measure, and insist upon their passing. A little child can lead a horse to water, but in the Senate it will take at least forty men to make him drink. If the Senator were to undertake such a plan as that, and if he has to make enlistments enough upon his side to succeed, it will probably be fatal to the whole measure.

For that Senator's State a bill has already been passed for one public building at this session of Congress which has become a law. There are many cases in other States where there are crying needs for public buildings, and in which the fate of measures has not been so fortunate.

Now, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, without a disposition to be unfair to any public consideration that might address itself to that committee, after looking over the field and seeing that in some States by the diligent attention, perhaps, of its representatives; by the fact, perhaps, that those representatives were upon committees that dealt with these subjects, and therefore had them immediately drawn to their attention and to their interest; by reason of the fact, perhaps, that in the other House the member having it in charge was fortunate enough to get recognition from the Speaker, and get the bill passed through those agencies which are the inevitable concomitants of parliamentary bodies, some at least have been fully or fairly provided for and others totally neglected.

No less than four or five bills have passed this body for public buildings in the State which I have the honor in part to represent; not one of them has been so fortunate as to pass the other body yet; and we all know that at this session of Congress our co-ordinate branch of legislation has been so occupied by other public measures which exacted their attention that they have not had the opportunity presented they have in ordinary sessions of Congress to take in hand and deal with this subject-matter in the manner that they would otherwise do.

Now, sir, so far as the rules of this body are concerned, it has been shown so amply by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that there is no point of order which can be raised against these bills that the gentlemen who intimated their intention to raise such points must necessarily have abandoned their opposition, and the question is before us whether or not we will at the proper time give fair and due consideration to those propositions to insert provisions for public buildings in this bill, which seem to appeal to the equity of this body in the just distribution of the patronage of the Government in that line, which is due to the several States.

I would not favor, and I imagine there are few here who would favor, the proposition to put all public building measures in this bill simply because they have been adopted by the Senate. That would be something quite extraordinary; but, on the other hand, why is it not just, why is it not proper, why is it not equitable and legitimate in every sense to insert in this bill such provisions for public buildings as may seem to have the strongest considerations to support them, and which might seem to be just in the equitable distribution of the surplus to make accommodations for the people?

The Senator from Missouri has time and again assailed upon this floor the provisions which the Senate has been making for public buildings; but I notice, sir, whenever his State comes along, when a proposition which strikes even to his home at Kansas City, or at Springfield, or anywhere else where there is a fair public demand for a public building, his scruples do not seem to actuate him to oppose them, and he prefers to fire his darts at other people, while at the same time he makes proper provision for his own constituents.

I do not complain of the Senator from Missouri because he diligently represents his own people in securing for them the proper public accommodations which they require, but I do not see that his position is a rampart which it is very becoming for him to stand behind when he is firing darts at others who neither seek nor desire more than he himself.

Mr. President, I do not regard these provisions for public buildings as objectionable on the ground of extravagance or as opposed to any fair public policy. Every one knows that there is a great surplus lying in the Treasury and every one knows there are also all sorts of demands made upon Congress for the disbursement and distribution of that surplus in many directions. In what direction can it better be disbursed than by making those public conveniences of post-offices and custom-houses which, if we do not absolutely need to-day, we are certain to need to-morrow in the rapid growth of our country and in the rapid increase of its business?

It is infinitely better, sir, for the whole people of this country that their money should be distributed to secure the proper accouterments and equipments of Government in its enlarged and liberal sense than in going to Wall street and paying 27 cents on the dollar for debts which are not yet due and which are bearing small rates of interest.

If this Government could be individualized; if one cool-headed, deliberate, sensible business man could personate the Government of the United States; if he had in charge the business of these many republics which compose this Union, and if he had a surplus in his pocket, let me ask the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator here if he would not deem that he was doing a judicious and wise thing to fit up his establishment with modern methods, with all the proper improvements, and make court-house and custom-house and post-office fulfill their mission, as they ought to do, in a reputable and, if you please, in a liberal style, rather than to go looking after his creditor who has a note maturing years after, which there will be no difficulty about his paying, and offering him a bonus of 26 or 27 cents on the dollar to surrender that note now?

There is no merchant, there is no business man in the country who would not pursue, if this were a private matter, the method which the Senate is pursuing in making proper provision for public buildings.

For myself, sir, and, I hope, for the Senate, the Senate will insist upon inserting in this sundry civil bill provision for all proper public improvements which appeal to its good sense and to its fair economy. Then if it goes to the other House, it will be for them to say what they will do with it. But this is clearly within our functions, and within our rule; it is clearly consistent with public policy; it is in consonance with sound economy, and I can not conceive of any good reason that can be assigned against it.

Mr. VEST. I am not vain enough to suppose that my legislative or individual record is of sufficient importance to detain the Senate for a single moment; but I simply want to make this observation, and I shall appeal to the RECORD in order to substantiate it: So far from opposing public buildings, I have reported more bills for public buildings to the Senate, outside of my own State, since I have been a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, than any other member of that committee, excepting my venerable friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who is now detained from the Senate by illness.

In addition to that, so far from being amenable to the charge made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], I have reported at this session, and urged the passage of, a general law providing for post-office buildings in every town of the United States where the revenues for three years preceding amounted to a certain sum. I have reported, as the records show, and advocated time and again liberal expenditures for public buildings on the ground that it was a good investment for the people of the United States, if, for no other reason, because it placed before the people always the insignia of nationality, the flag of the Government, the property of the Government, and bound together by the common tie of interest all the different sections of the Union.

That is my record, known to all the older members of the Senate. For ten years I have labored as industriously as any one in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and my brother Senators know that I have surpassed even the bounds of extreme goodness in reporting bills for other States than my own.

The Senator alludes to the fact that a bill passed this Congress to erect a public building in Missouri. That is true. It was a bill which passed the last Congress and was vetoed by the President, and after that time the objection he had to the measure was removed by the action of Congress in locating Federal courts at that town. The bill came from the House, not originated by myself, and I discharged the plainest and most ordinary duty of a Senator in securing the passage of a measure which the member from that district had already secured the passage of by the other House.

Now, let me make one other remark. I have, next to representing my own State on this floor, attempted to represent old Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. I did not throw any criticism upon the Senator on that score.

Mr. VEST. The Senator's remark was in the direction that I had discriminated for my own State. I tell the Senator now to go to the record and see how many public buildings have been put in the State of Virginia in the last five years. His immediate predecessor was chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and if any committee of this body was ever put to the sole function of erecting public buildings in a State, it was done by the former chairman of that committee in behalf of the State of Virginia; and whilst I was not allied to that Senator by any political or personal ties, I made no opposition to those bills and the record shows that more public buildings in proportion to population have been put in the State of Virginia within the last five years than in any other State in this Union, with the exception of the State of Maine. I speak from memory, but the record is easily accessible and the correctness of my statement can be verified or disputed.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. VEST. Well, I think not. Mr. President, I will find out in a very few moments. I did not apprehend that this point would arise in the discussion, but it is very easily settled. But suffice it to say that so far from legislating for my own State, which is to a certain extent my duty, I have endeavored upon all occasions to make liberal appropriations for public buildings throughout the United States without regard to section or political affinity.

I object to this amendment unless the other amendments go in, because, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] most justly observed, it is parlimentary coercion of the House of Representatives and of the President of the United States in behalf of a few bills which have no superior merit over others. If the Senate sees proper to put all these bills on as amendments, I make no opposition; I will raise no point of order. Under the former rulings of the presiding officers, indorsed by the Senate, this amendment is in order; but I object to it upon general legislative grounds. I say it is not the proper way in which to secure the passage of these bills. I am as anxious to secure the passage of the bills for public buildings in the State in which I reside as any other Senator can possibly be. I did not offer any of them as an amendment because I neglected my duty, but because I did not think the Appropriations Committee would consent to these amendments, and because my own judgment and conscience were not entirely in favor of this course of isolating out and segregating certain measures here and forcing them upon a general appropriation bill at the expense—for it is nothing else—of other legislation of the same character.

If the Senate sees proper to take these bills and put them on, I shall make no further opposition; but I do object to taking out specifically certain bills and putting them upon this general appropriation bill, and thereby making a discrimination in favor of the activity or attention to business of certain Senators at the expense of other Senators who have not offered these amendments and caused them to be reported here by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. There never was a minute in which I could not put in that amendment here. As a member of that committee all that it was necessary for me to do was to ask my colleagues to agree to it. But I did not think the Committee on Appropriations would contemplate the amendments at all; and I said then and I say now that if one of those amendments goes on all should go on. We should make no distinction. That is the full extent and the whole of my argument.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri misapprehended the point of my criticism. I had not charged or intimated that he was selfish, that he was illiberal, that he was unjust. I do not think so, for I recognize just what he has stated for himself, that he has been perfectly fair in so far as his vote and his influence have gone; but I intended to criticise his position that it was right to pass every bill because one was put in; and the fact that he did not seem to discriminate and recognize that one measure might be more meritorious than another, that one might be backed by larger considerations of justice and fairness than another; and furthermore it did not seem to me quite the appropriate thing that he who had been fortunate in having a portion, at least, of the bills which he thought just to his State passed, should insist on having all other bills for his State passed, because in some States where no provision had been made to meet the public demands it was proposed here in this bill to rectify that fact and to secure some degree of equalization.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky insist on his point of order?

Mr. BECK. It seems to be generally understood that my point of order is not well taken.

Mr. SPOONER. That has not been decided.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I want to call attention simply to the construction of the first clause of the sixteenth rule, and I will read so much as seems to me to be applicable:

> And no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill * * * to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session.

If the words "or act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session" were stricken out there could be no difficulty in construing this clause, and it is insisted that the words "or act or resolution previously passed by the Senate" enlarge the power of the Senate to vote in such an amendment as that proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I take it that in using the words "act or resolution previously passed by the Senate" the Committee on Rules and the Senate understood what they were doing, and that they did not mean a bill which had passed the Senate or a resolution which had passed the Senate and not passed the House, but that they meant "act or resolution" in the legal sense—that is, that it was a finished act. You could not presume, certainly, that the Committee on Rules and the Senate meant to adopt a rule and then nullify the rule in the very same clause by providing, in the first place, that no amendment should be received to add a new item of appropriation unless some bill for it had passed the Senate, because that it would seem to be strange, and would leave out of sight the reason for the rule.

For what do we appropriate? To carry out some law, to execute some policy of the Government. A bill which has passed the Senate only is not a law; it is no part of the policy of the Government; and I take it then that we must attach the legal sense to the words "act or resolution;" that is, an act or resolution that has passed both Houses of Congress. The words, "previously passed by the Senate during that session," it seems to me have reference simply to a law, an act so passed.

The second clause provides that—

> All amendments to general appropriation bills moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, proposing to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add new items of appropriation.

It seems to me that has reference to and is controlled by the first section, that an amendment shall not "increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session." It seems to me that the second clause is built upon the first and contemplates the full execution of the first clause, and then goes on to amplify the provisions of the first clause of the amendment.

All I desire to do is to call attention to that construction. Of course I do not assume to be able to give information to the Presiding Officer of the Senate as to the meaning of the rules, but it seems to me that construction deserves consideration.

Mr. BECK. After hearing the discussion, and indeed having very great doubts myself as to whether the point of order was well taken, I will withdraw the point of order, because I think the amendment is in order. I will, however, ask a vote on the merits of the proposition, not that I object to it, but I object to the policy of inserting bills that have only passed the Senate and have not passed the House of Representatives, or been submitted to the President, on an appropriation bill like this; and, therefore, while I shall not vote against the amendment, it is not because of any objection to the proposition itself, but because I am unwilling to vote to insert it and similar bills on the sundry civil bill, for the reason that it may give us trouble both on principle and policy in dealing with the other House.

I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order being withdrawn, a he question recurs on agreeing to the amendment, on which the Senetor from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] asks that the yeas and nays may be ntered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE]. If he were here, I should vote in the negative.

Mr. MITCHELL (when Mr. DOLPH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. DOLPH] is still detained from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN]. If my colleague were here he would vote "yea."

Mr. FARWELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. GEORGE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is absent. I believe he has a general pair with the Senator from New Hampsbire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. BLAIR. I will pair with him at any time the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] says so.

Mr. WALTHALL. I thought there was a general pair between the Senators.

Mr. BLAIR. The colleague of the Senator came to me yesterday morning and said he was doing some work, and might be detained from the Senate, and desired to refer the question of my voting to his colleague.

Mr. REAGAN. I asked the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] as he was going out this morning if he was paired, and he said he was paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator from Mississippi know how his colleague would vote on this question if he were present?

Mr. WALTHALL. I do. I heard him express himself before he went out. He would vote "nay."

Mr. BLAIR. Then I withdraw my vote. I voted in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws his vote. The roll-call will proceed.

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MANDERSON (when Mr. PADDOCK'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], but on this question I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. SPOONER (when Mr. SAWYER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SAWYER] is detained from the Senate to-day by illness, and is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CALL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. PASCO] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. I do not know how my colleague would vote on this question if present.

Mr. BROWN. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were present, I should vote "nay," and I suppose he would vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the negative). At the request of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] I paired with his colleague [Mr. SAWYER] yesterday evening, who was absent on account of sickness. Does the Senator know how his colleague would vote?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not, but I think he would vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I withdraw my vote, as I voted "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Aldrich,	Evarts,	Payne,	Stockbridge,
Bowen,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Teller,
Cameron,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,	Wilson of Iowa.
Chandler,	Manderson,	Sabin,
Cullom,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Daniel,	Palmer,	Stewart,

NAYS—23.

Allison,	Call,	Hampton,	Saulsbury,
Bate,	Coke,	Hawley,	Sherman,
Beck,	Dawes,	Jones of Arkansas,	Vest,
Berry,	Edmunds,	Morgan,	Walthall,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.
Blodgett,	Gray,	Reagan,

ABSENT—32.

Blair,	Eustis,	Hearst,	Platt,
Brown,	Farwell,	Hiscock,	Quay,
Butler,	Faulkner,	Hoar,	Ransom,
Chace,	Frye,	Kenna,	Sawyer,
Cockrell,	George,	McPherson,	Stanford,
Colquitt,	Gorman,	Morrill,	Turpie,
Davis,	Hale,	Paddock,	Vance,
Dolph,	Harris,	Pasco,	Voorhees.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPOONER. In view of the decision of the Senate as to the policy of amending the sundry civil bill by rejecting the proposition I offered, I shall not offer any more of the amendments reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the same character; but I desire to offer an amendment—

For the purchase of site and the erection of a building thereon for court-house, post-office, and other purposes, at Opelousas, La., $50,000.

The case is this: The House passed the bill and the Senate passed the bill and it is now in the hands of the President. By inadvertence the appropriation clause was omitted, and there is no reason to suppose the bill will not meet the approval of the President. The Federal court is held at this place. The appropriation is a small one. The reports of the committees of both Houses have been unanimous in favor of the bill; and I hope, as this is clearly distinguishable from the other set of propositions, that it will not be objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

For the purchase of site and erection of a building thereon for court-house, post-office, and other purposes at Opelousas, La., $50,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. SPOONER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were present I should vote "nay," and I presume he would vote "yea."

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. FARWELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I vote "nay," and I ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a very brief statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate not being in order pending the roll-call, is there objection to the Senator from Louisiana making a statement? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, the bill now before us is an act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, as I understand it, is to erect a public building in the town of Opelousas, parish of St. Landry, in my State. I have offered the bill for this purpose Congress after Congress for many years, and I regret that the Senator from Wisconsin, without consulting me, now presents it as an amendment on an appropriation bill limited for the next fiscal year, just after a similar amendment for a public building has been voted down in the Senate by a decisive majority. Its defeat, therefore, is certain.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me a moment, I will state——

Mr. GIBSON. I expect I shall meet the point the Senator desires to make.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to correct the Senator.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not hear the Senator, but I take it that the difference between the previous amendment and the one now proposed by him is this, that the bill for the public building in Kansas had only passed the Senate, whereas the bill for the public building in Opelousas has also passed the House. But neither has been approved by the President; and therefore the relation they hold to the President is identical. In either case it would deprive the President of the exercise of his independent judgment.

The Executive shares with Congress the legislative power by the exercise of the veto, and I submit that all such bills should not be offered as amendments on the sundry civil bill, carrying, as this bill does, over $25,000,000 for the expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year. I voted just now with a majority of the Senate against putting bills to erect public buildings on the sundry civil bill, and having so voted in respect of such an amendment for Kansas, I feel that I must be consistent and vote against an amendment for a public building in my own State.

It must be clear to every one that the amendment now offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be defeated, and therefore in casting my vote in the negative with a majority of the Senators I do not in any measure lessen the chances for a public building in Opelousas, a matter I know to be of the highest public importance and one I have for many years had at heart.

That bill I carried through the Senate, and it is now before the President. If vetoed by the President it would be stricken from the sundry civil bill in conference even if the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin should be adopted, of which there is no possibility in view of the vote just taken, and if approved by the President the proper place for the appropriation is on the deficiency bill, unless the judgment of the Senate shall change.

I trust the President may approve the bill to erect a public building in Opelousas. That town is in the center of the largest parish—outside of the parish in which the city of New Orleans is located—the great parish of St. Landry, one of the most populous, most intelligent, and prosperous parishes in the State of Louisiana, where the amount of business done in the court of the United States that holds its sessions there, and the post-office, justifies and demands a public building in which the records may be preserved and the public business transacted.

The amount asked for is only $50,000, and I believe the President will sign the bill now before him. At all events, the Senate has settled the question so far as it is concerned by its action on the bill for a public building in Kansas, and in view of the facts and circumstances I deem it my duty to vote in the one case as in the other.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Louisiana referred to the vote just having been taken by the Senate as on a proposition for the erection of a public building in my State.

Mr. GIBSON. I beg pardon; in Kansas I meant.

Mr. SPOONER. I am glad to have the Senator correct his mistake. I offered this amendment in the utmost good faith, having a similar one for the State of Iowa to offer, not supposing that it would meet the opposition of any Senator.

As I stated, the bill for this building passed the House of Representatives without objection upon the unanimous report of the committee; it passed the Senate without objection on the unanimous report of its committee; but by mere inadvertence the appropriation clause was omitted from the bill. The only object of this amendment is to remedy that defect.

There is no attempt to constrain the President, and, of course, no attempt to constrain either House, for the proposition has met the approval of both Houses. I regarded and still regard the proposition as entirely distinguishable from that upon which the Senate has voted, and announced to the Senate upon offering this amendment that I intended to follow it up with a similar one of $40,000 for Ottumwa, Iowa, but that in view of the decision of the Senate upon the Atchison amendment I should offer no more amendments like that one. Of course I would not ask the Senate to pass a bill appropriating money for a public building in any State against the protest of the Senator from the State in which it is located. I therefore ask unanimous consent, if it may be granted, to withdraw the amendment. If that can not be done I shall vote against the amendment myself.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my honorable friend from Wisconsin——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pause. The Chair has been led into an error from want of familiarity with the rules, and has wrongfully permitted the roll-call to be interrupted. The rule requires specifically that Senators shall record their names without debate, and provides further:

Nor shall the Presiding Officer entertain any request to suspend it by unanimous consent.

Therefore, the Chair has erred in permitting the roll-call to be suspended and allowing anything to be said whatever.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Chair will continue his error for half a minute longer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair feels bound to retrace his erroneous footsteps as early as possible, and will therefore decline to hear any further debate while the roll-call is pending.

Mr. HOAR. I will take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After the roll-call. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. No, now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After the roll-call. The roll-call will proceed.

The Chief Clerk proceeded with the call of the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. CALL (when Mr. PASCO'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PASCO] is detained from the Senate by business. He is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. I do not know how my colleague would vote if present, and the Senator from Illinois is at liberty to vote if he so desires.

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. Being paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], and not knowing how he would vote, I simply announce my pair and withhold my vote. I should vote "nay" but for the pair.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I have agreed to pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], who is detained from the Senate, and release the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] so that he can vote.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well; I vote "nay."

Mr. BLAIR (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FRYE. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. CHANDLER (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws his vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. My colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. SPOONER. If my colleague [Mr. SAWYER] were present I have no doubt under the circumstances he would vote "nay," and I therefore state to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that he is released from his pair on this question and may vote if he chooses.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I vote "nay."

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. I do not know how he would vote. I should vote "nay" if I were not paired.

The result was then announced—yeas 6, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—6.

Bowen,	Daniel,	Teller,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cameron,	Evarts,

NAYS—33.

Aldrich,	Coke,	Manderson,	Saulsbury,
Allison,	Cullom,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Bate,	Dawes,	Morgan,	Stockbridge,
Beck,	Gibson,	Payne,	Vest,
Berry,	Gray,	Plumb,	Walthall,
Blackburn,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.
Blodgett,	Hawley,	Ransom,
Call,	Hearst,	Reagan,
Cockrell,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,

ABSENT—37.

Blair,	Farwell,	Jones of Arkansas,	Sawyer,
Brown,	Faulkner,	Kenna,	Sherman,
Butler,	Frye,	McPherson,	Stanford,
Chace,	George,	Morrill,	Stewart,
Chandler,	Gorman,	Paddock,	Turpie,
Colquitt,	Hale,	Palmer,	Vance,
Davis,	Harris,	Pasco,	Voorhees.
Dolph,	Hiscock,	Platt,
Edmunds,	Hoar,	Quay,
Eustis,	Ingalls,	Sabin,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill—

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia a sum equal to all collections made from said States and Territories and the District of Columbia or from any of the citizens or inhabitants thereof or other persons, under the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and the amendatory acts thereto.

That all moneys still due to the United States on the quota of direct tax apportioned by section 8 of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, are hereby remitted and relinquished.

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to reimburse each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia for all money found due to them under the provisions of this act; and the Treasurer of the United States is hereby directed to pay the same to the governors of the States and Territories, and to the commissioners of the District of Columbia: Provided, That where the sums, or any part thereof, credited to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, have been collected by the United States from the citizens or inhabitants thereof, or any other person, either directly or by sale of property, such sums shall be held in trust by such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for the benefit of those persons or inhabitants from whom they were collected, or their legal representatives: And provided further, That no part of the money collected from individuals and to be held in trust as aforesaid shall be retained by the United States as a set-off against any indebtedness alleged to exist against the State, Territory, or District of Columbia in which such tax was collected: And provided further, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid out by the governor of any State or Territory, or by any other person, to any attorney or agent under any contract for services now existing or heretofore made between the representative of any State or Territory and any attorney or agent. All claims under the trust hereby created shall be filed with the governor of such State or Territory, and the commissioners of the District of Columbia, respectively, within six years next after the passage of this act, and all claims not so filed shall be forever barred, and the money distributable thereto shall belong to such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, respectively, as the case may be.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin very kindly allows me, as I wish to be absent from the Chamber a little while, to offer an amendment, which I think will meet with no opposition, and his amendment may be laid aside for the moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be laid aside informally, and the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts received.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to raise the question of order on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow that to stand aside a moment?

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment may be read; I have no objection to that. My point of order is that it is general legislation proposed to a general appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee did not understand the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, which was that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin might be temporarily laid aside, as the Senator from Massachusetts was compelled to leave the Chamber, to allow him to offer an amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Oh, yes. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, then, is not an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; it is a separate amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 117, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

Catalogue of the Congressional Library: To enable the Librarian of Congress to complete the catalogue of the Congressional Library and have the same printed as soon as may be with due regard to the excellence and thoroughness of the work, $18,000.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say one word. The cataloguing of the Library of Congress has been suspended now for nearly twelve years, and I have no doubt that a suitable catalogue would multiply the value of the Congressional Library by ten to every member of this body. Mr. Spofford estimates that that sum can reasonably be expended for the current year. The recommendation comes from the Committee on the Library.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], upon which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] raises the point of order that it proposes general legislation, and therefore can not be received. The Chair has no doubt upon the subject. The Chair holds that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I present an amendment to come in at the point indicated in the amendment for the public building in Atchison, Kans.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of page 9, it is proposed to insert:

For post-office at Staunton, Va.: For the purchase of site and completion of building, $50,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide a site, and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fireproof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office and the internal-revenue office, and for other Government uses, at the city of Staunton, Va. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $50,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $50,000 for site and building, which sum is hereby appropriated; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 50 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Virginia shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, it will be noticed that that is an amendment and not a bill. It is printed as an amendment. It was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on the 28th instant, and this is the 31st. It was referred to the Committee on Appropriations on Saturday last. It comes here under a rule of the Senate, which was construed, as was read in the Senate this morning, as far back as 1884, from which construction no appeal has ever been taken and no exception has ever been made to it, and under that construction of the rule the Senate has proceeded from that time until now.

That construction was rendered, as the Senator from Wisconsin said, on a proposition to amend an appropriation bill for the construction of three cruisers—two or three, I am not certain which, although I was upon the Committee on Naval Affairs. The amendment provided even for the plan of the vessels; it provided for the method of letting the contracts; it provided for everything that was necessary for the carrying out of the entire purposes and objects of the measure, and the then President pro tempore of the Senate held that it was not general legislation, and the Senate accepted that decision and has accepted it, until to-day we see the spectacle of a "solid South" voting against it.

I, sir, want to put them on record again; I want to know who they are. I do not want to impugn their motives on this floor, but I want them to carry home their record with them and let the Southern people test them, and let them test what will be the temper of those people. They will answer them as they deserve, in my judgment, to be answered. On the pretense that it is general legislation, contrary to a judgment from which they have not dared to appeal in four years, they attempt this morning to defeat this legislation, and they say that this is to some extent partisan legislation. Why, the bill from which this amendment is taken has been in the House of Representatives now for months, and I am prepared to say that I hear it from authority that is indisputable that there are members of that House on committees who do not hesitate to ask the question, "Who offered these bills in the Senate?"

I voted against the amendment for the court-house in Louisiana. I did it because the Senator from that State said he did not want it in this bill. I never vote for him or anybody anything he does not want. We build court-houses and custom-houses and post-offices in Virginia for different uses, anyhow, from those to which they are put sometimes in Louisiana.

Mr. President, I do not suppose if I were to prolong this discussion from now until the end of the session that I should effect any lodgment in the minds of Senators who it seems have resolved that no appropriations shall be made unless they are made in their own State first, or unless all are taken together. According to the plan of these Senators there can be no methodical legislation on this bill. There can be only one amendment acted upon at a time, but we are met at the threshold with the declaration that you must have all of these amendments, accept them all, or none; and that is an utter impossibility in any legislative body. A county board of supervisors would hardly pass upon more than one appropriation at a time. Even where they have a dog law to enforce, to tax dogs, to pay for sheep, they would not pass an appropriation to pay for more than one farmer's sheep at a time.

I have offered the amendment because I know it comes within the rule. Its defeat will be my victory. I therefore offer it so as to give these Senators an opportunity to again ease their consciences as to this manner of appropriating the public money. It is about the first time I ever heard of a Democrat or a body of Democrats voting against an appropriation of the public funds. I have known them frequently to speak against such appropriations, but rarely, if ever, to vote against them.

They can find it constitutional to appropriate $10,000 for garden-seeds for Texas, but Texas can not find it in the Constitution to construct a public building in the town of Staunton or in the city of Atchison. Constitutional they can find it to run shovel and plow through little dry streams under the title of a river and harbor bill, but they can not find it within their conscientious view of the Constitution to construct a public building in any one of the Virginia towns or in any other town or city, ay, even where the Government has gone to the expense of constructing a public building and where the cities have grown to double or treble or quadruple the population by the time the buildings are constructed, and now they are inadequate, and when we ask for a certain sum of money, a small sum, $30,000 in one case, only to enlarge the capacity of the building so as to save the necessity of constructing another building, it is not within the purview of the Constitution!

Mr. President, the insinuation has been thown out this morning that the State of Virginia had gotten more than her share, or possibly quite as much as her share, and that we had no right to complain. I am not complaining of any lack of her share; I am not thinking of that. We are not dividing out, we are not issuing shares; but I would ask the Senator from Missouri to tell me how many public buildings Virginia got when my former colleague was chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The Senator says that he reported more bills for public buildings than any other member of the committee except the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] who is absent. I should like to ask him whether he reported any for Virginia, or whether he can name one that was reported by my former colleague for that State? I can name one for him, and I guess that will cover the catalogue—a court-house at Harrisonburgh, where the county had been furnishing the United States a public building ever since the war without one dollar of cost to the Government, and then we passed a bill to erect one for the paltry sum, I think, of about $50,000, including land purchase and all.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this amendment and hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to adopt it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], upon which he asks that the yeas and nays may be entered upon the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EVARTS. May I ask that the amendment be read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is for a public building at Staunton, Va. Does the Senator desire to hear it read in full?

Mr. EVARTS. No, sir.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who is absent from the Chamber. My colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is recorded as having voted.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then I will vote "yea."

Mr. BROWN. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], but as it appears that a quorum has not voted, I take the liberty, after conversation with his colleague, to break the pair and vote "nay."

Mr. FRYE. To make a quorum I will vote.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. SPOONER. Is there a quorum voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum is not recorded.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I record my vote in the affirmative.

Mr. BROWN. To make a quorum I will vote. I vote "nay"

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS 16.

Bowen,	Frye,	Mitchell,	Stewart,
Chandler,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Stockbridge,
Daniel,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,	Teller,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRYE. I move to amend the bill, on page 3, at the end of line 23, after the word "dollars," by inserting the following additional item:

For post-office and custom-house at Eastport, Me.: For additional amount for foundation of building, $8,000. If, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, a safe foundation can not be provided for this sum, or the interests of the Government require it, then he is hereby authorized to sell or exchange the present site and purchase or procure another; and for that purpose he may use so much of this appropriation as may be necessary.

I desire to state that Congress appropriated $100,000 for building a custom-house and post-office at Eastport to take the place of one that was burned about a year ago, when nearly the whole city was swept out of existence. The city seems to be located on a solid ledge. The Government selected a site and proceeded to put in the foundation when, singularly enough, on the north side of it the ledge suddenly dished, and from 20 to 25 feet deep they have found quicksand. The engineer in charge has reported to the Secretary of the Treasury two methods by which he thinks this may be obviated, and the one he regards as the better will involve an expense of about $8,000. The Secretary of the Treasury has sent a communication to the Senate, which I had yesterday to show the chairman of the committee, but have not by me now, in which he recommends that something be done here.

Lest a safe foundation may not be secured at this spot, he asks for the necessary legislation to enable him to exchange this site for another by exchange or by purchase, and this amendment simply authorizes the Secretary to do that; if he thinks it better to try the foundation he may do so, and if he thinks it is not better, to try then to exchange that site for another and use so much of this as is necessary.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move to insert what I send to the desk after line 8, on page 68 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 68, after the amendment already agreed to, in line 8, it is proposed to insert:

The sum of $2,800 to be paid to the treasurer of the "Old Settler" or "Western Cherokee" Indians, for and on account of the value of the old Cherokee agency in the State of Arkansas, as well as the value of a certain saw and grist mill provided in article 4 of the treaty of 1828, and eight railway corn-mills provided for in the fourth article of the treaty of 1834 with said Indians: Provided, That the same shall be taken and accepted as a full and final discharge of all claim against the United States growing out of said treaties on account of said Cherokee agency and said saw and grist mills.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa will state his point of order.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a private claim.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I confess——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Arkansas proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I confess that I do not appreciate the force of the point made by the Senator from Iowa that this is a private claim. It is a claim originating under a treaty of the United States with the Cherokee Indians. In 1817 part of the Cherokee Nation removed to Arkansas, and in 1828, by a treaty made with the United States, that band of Cherokees who are known as the Old Settlers agreed to remove to their present residence west of the State of Arkansas. At the time of the treaty of 1828 an agreement was made by the Government of the United States that, amongst other considerations for their moving west, the Government should erect for them a certain saw and grist mill. By the treaty of 1832 the Government of the United States agreed, in lieu of the saw and grist mill to be erected under the treaty of 1828, that it would erect eight patent railway corn-mills. One of those mills was erected; seven of them were not. This is for the benefit of the Cherokee Nation, and it seems to me it is hardly amenable to the point of order of its being a private claim, especially as it is carrying out a treaty stipulation. I will wait until the Chair rules on the point of order before I say any more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The fourth clause of Rule XVI reads:

4. No amendment, the object of which is to provide for a private claim, shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

The Chair has no knowledge whether this is a just claim under the treaty, but the amendment is obviously within the rule, because the clause of the treaty under which the amendment is proposed to be made is cited on the face thereof.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state, if the Chair is disposed to hold that it is in order, that it is not to carry out the provision of a treaty, as I understand it, but it is to get rid of a provision of a treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no means of knowing whether the allegation is true or not; but the amendment in form, the Chair thinks, is within the rule.

Mr. ALLISON. I made a hasty examination yesterday, the Senator from Arkansas stating to me that he intended to propose this amendment, and from a long report, which I read, I think instead of carrying out a treaty it is to settle with some individual who has a claim because the treaty was not carried out.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I have no personal interest in this matter, and I have no desire to have the amendment adopted unless it meets the approval of the entire Senate. I have presented the amendment at the request of the attorney of the Old Settler Cherokee Indians. The facts are stated in the report for and against the bill—for this provision, I will confess, probably unlike a good many things that are brought into the Senate, has two sides to it—all the facts are set out in the report to which I called the attention of the Senator from Iowa yesterday.

There was an agreement made in the treaty of 1828 between the United States and this western band of Cherokees who had been living in the Territory of Arkansas for eleven years, that if they would remove to the territory occupied by the Cherokees west of the present State, a number of things would be done, amongst other things a saw and grist mill was to be erected for the benefit of these people. In 1832 that condition was changed by the treaty, and the Government agreed to erect eight patent railway corn-mills, as they were called, and three or four years ago the representative of these Old Settler Cherokees came here and presented a bill to make an appropriation of $16,000, as they recited in their bill, to pay for the Old Cherokee reservation in Arkansas, to pay for a saw and grist mill that was to be erected for the Indians, and to pay for these eight patent railway corn-mills.

The considerations upon which the Government agreed to erect the mill in 1828 were that the old Cherokee reservation in Arkansas should be ceded to the Government. It was a tract of land on the Arkansas River 100 miles or so to the east of Fort Smith. The Government, if it had erected the saw-mill, would have paid for the land, but as it did not erect the saw-mill and agreed to erect eight patent railway corn-mills in lieu of it, they were entitled to pay for one of the items and one only; they were not entitled to pay for the saw and grist mill and also for the eight patent railway corn-mills.

The question was submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and in a long letter reciting all these facts, he stated that the Indian agent of the five civilized tribes had been directed to investigate the question, and he reported that of the eight mills which were agreed to be erected, but one has been erected, and that had been done at an expense of about $400, and that seven of the mills that were to have been constructed as a part of the consideration for the land had not been erected at all. It is on the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that these seven mills that were to be erected, by a contract between the United States and the Indians, have never been erected, that this appropriation is asked for. Four hundred dollars apiece for seven of these mills amounts to $2,800.

If the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs can be relied upon, if the report of the special agent of the Department who has investigated this question is entitled to any respect at the hands of Congress, it is a perfectly plain case that these Old Settler Cherokees are entitled to this $2,800 and that they have been for a great many years, and it seems to me but right and proper that the item should go on the appropriation bill and the amount be appropriated.

Mr. BECK. I do not know anything about this matter, but this is dealing with a thing of the past. The sundry civil bill, with the exception of some few items, generally deals with things that will happen hereafter. The deficiency bill will come before the Committee on Appropriations in a very few days, when all cases of this kind that have occurred in the past can be dealt with. Upon that bill the Senator from Arkansas can attend to this measure and look over it carefully and look at the reports carefully. None of us have had a chance to examine it, unless it be the chairman who looked at it yesterday. Would it not be well to attach the amendment to that bill, as it appears to be in order on that bill? Such a course might save some discussion and some trouble, and the question could be more properly and probably more rapidly disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. This amendment was sent by the Committee on Indian Affairs to the Committee on Appropriations with a recommendation that it be put on this bill, and when the Committee on Appropriations had the sundry civil bill under consideration I sent the amendment to the committee with the report, and if the members of the committee did not see it, I am sure it is no fault of mine.

Besides, this is not in the ordinary sense a deficiency. It is a thing that extends forty or fifty years back. I presume it would be as objectionable on the deficiency as on the sundry civil bill, and as the Government of the United States admit the liability, and as it is a small matter, it seems to me we might as well dispose of it now as at any other time.

I do not wish to be captious about this thing, and if the Committee on Appropriations desire time to look further into the matter, I shall be glad to have them do so, but it seems to me, under the circumstances, it might be well to dispose of it now.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will send up the report made by the Committee on Indian Affairs. This is a private claim and nothing else.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I send the report to the Secretary. It is Senate Report No. 839, made at the first session Forty-ninth Congress, by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report, which is as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1601) to provide for the settlement of certain Cherokee claims, have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

About the year 1817 a part of the Cherokee Nation moved west of the Mississippi River and settled in what is now the western part of Arkansas. These people have been since known as the "Old Settlers," or Western Cherokees.

In 1828 a treaty was made with them by which they agreed to remove to the country they now occupy, and in said treaty the following provision is found:

"It is further agreed that the property and improvements connected with the agency shall be sold under the direction of the agent, and the proceeds of the same applied to aid in the erection, in the country to which the Cherokees are going, of a grist and saw mill for their use."

In the subsequent treaty of February 14, 1833, the following language is found:

"And said United States will cause to be erected on said lands, for the benefit of said Cherokees, eight patent railway corn-mills, to be erected according to the stipulations of the fourth article of said treaty of 6th of May, 1828, from the avails of the old agency."

On June 23, 1834, Congress made an appropriation of $1,600 for the purchase of the corn-mills for the Cherokees, and in 1844 eight patent railway corn-mills were purchased by the Indian agent and paid for by the United States, costing $200 each.

It seems that one of these mills was erected and the other seven were not. This bill is intended to compensate the Cherokees for the failure of the Government to erect these mills.

Hon. H. L. Muldrow, Acting Secretary, under date of April 22, 1886, writes as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, April 22, 1886.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 1st instant, inclosing for examination and report S. No. 1601, entitled 'A bill to provide for the settlement of certain Cherokee claims.'

"The subject having been referred to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I transmit herewith, for the information of the committee, a copy of his reply of 20th instant.

"The Commissioner recites the provision of the eleventh article of the Cherokee treaty of 1846, noted in the bill, and the resolution of the Senate referred to, and states that he is unable to see what 'relation the sum of $16,000 proposed by the bill to be appropriated and paid to the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokee Indians, bears either to the Senate award of the 5th of September, 1850, or to the eleventh article of the treaty of 1846.'

"If, however, the intention of the bill be to pay these Indians the sum of $16,000 with interest thereon, as a money compensation for the eight patent railway corn-mills named in the bill," which were to be furnished under the provisions of the treaty of 1834 in lieu of the grist and saw mill stipulated in the treaty of 1828, "no objection can be made to the purpose of the bill, as the Government is manifestly under an obligation to erect the said patent railway corn-mills or pay the money compensation therefor."

The Commissioner expresses the view that the amount named in the bill is excessive, and that whatever amount is appropriated in settlement of the claims should be paid to the Cherokee Nation; and he has caused a bill to be draughted, a copy of which is herewith inclosed, intended to meet the views in the case as expressed by him, which provides for the payment of the sum of $2,800 with interest thereon from June 28, 1834, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum until paid; to be in full of all claims, etc., which he suggests may be adopted as a substitute for S. No. 1601.

The report of the Commissioner has the concurrence of this Department.

Very respectfully,

H. L. MULDROW, Acting Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 20, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your reference for report, of a communication, dated the 1st instant, from Hon. H. L. DAWES, chairman of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, referring for examination and early report a bill (S. 1601) entitled "A bill to provide for the settlement of certain Cherokee claims."

This bill authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of the Treasury of the United States, to the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokee Indians the sum of $16,000 with interest thereon, as provided by Senate resolution of September 5, 1850, based upon the eleventh article of the Cherokee treaty of 1846: Provided, That the same shall be taken and accepted as a full and final discharge of all claims against the United States arising from or growing out of all treaties made with the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokee Indians for or on account of the value of the Old Cherokee agency, in the State of Arkansas, as well as for the value of a certain grist and saw mill provided for in the Cherokee treaty of 1828, and eight railway corn-mills provided for in the treaty of 1834.

In reply I have the honor to report that the eleventh article of the Cherokee treaty of 1846 is as follows:

"Whereas the Cherokee delegations contend that the amount expended for the one year's subsistence, after their arrival in the West, of the Eastern Cherokees, is not properly chargeable to the treaty fund, it is hereby agreed that that question shall be submitted to the Senate of the United States for its decision, which shall decide whether the subsistence shall be borne by the United States or the Cherokee funds, and if by the Cherokees, then to say whether the subsistence shall be charged at a greater rate than $33.33 per head; and also the question, whether the Cherokee Nation shall be allowed interest on whatever sum may be found to be due the nation, and from what date and at what rate per annum." (9 Stats., page 875.)

The resolution of the Senate approved September 5, 1850, based upon said eleventh article of the treaty of 1846, is, in words, as follows:

"IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, September 5, 1850.

"Resolved by the Senate of the United States (as umpire under the treaty of 1846), That under the circumstances, the Cherokee Nation are entitled to the sum of $189,422.76 for subsistence, being the difference between the amount allowed by the act of June 12, 1838, and the amount actually paid and expended by the United States, and which excess was improperly charged to the treaty fund in the report of the accounting officers of the Treasury.

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that interest, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, should be allowed upon the sums found due the Eastern and Western Cherokees, respectively, from the 12th day of June, 1838, until paid."

In accordance with this award, Congress, in the Indian appropriation act, approved September 30, 1850, appropriated conditionally the aforesaid sum of $189,422.76, and the further sum of $532,896.90, to the "Old Settler" or "Western Cherokees" in full of all demands under the fourth article of the treaty of 1846 (9 Stats., page 556), which sums have been fully disbursed and paid over, under protest on the part of the Old Settlers, to the respective parties in interest.

From the extended debate which arose in the Senate on the 5th of September, 1850, on the resolutions aforesaid, it was clearly brought out that only two questions were submitted for the decree of the Senate, namely, subsistence and interest (see pages 1334-1340 Appendix Congressional Globe, Thirty-first Congress, first session).

I can not, therefore, see what relation the sum of $16,000 proposed by the bill to be appropriated and paid to the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokee Indians bears either to the Senate award of the 5th of September, 1850, or to the eleventh article of the treaty of 1846 (see House Report 2651, Forty-eighth Congress, second session).

If, however, the intention of the bill be to pay these Indians "the sum of $16,000 with interest thereon" as a money compensation for the eight patent railway corn-mills named in the bill and provided for in the Cherokee treaty of 1838, which was proclaimed April 12, 1834 (7 Stats., page 416), which were to be erected in lieu of the grist and saw mill according to the stipulation of the fourth article of the treaty of 1828 (7 Stats., page 312), then no objection should be made to the purpose of the bill, as the Government is manifestly under an obligation to erect the said patent railway corn-mills or pay a money compensation therefor.

Congress, by the act of June 28, 1834 (4 Stats., page 705), made an appropriation for the purchase of these corn-mills, and the Second Auditor of the Treasury, in a communication to this office, dated November 14, 1877, transmitted a copy of a voucher filed with the account rendered by P. M. Butler, Cherokee agent and special disbursing officer of the appropriation in question, which is as follows:

The United States to James Bonbright Dr., 1844.

For eight patent railway corn-mills, as per fourth article treaty of 1833, at $200 each	$1,600

Received, Fort Gibson, November 30, 1844, of Pierce M. Butler, Cherokee agent, $1,600, in full of the above account.

JAMES BONBRIGHT.

I certify on honor that the above account is correct and just, and that I have actually, this 13th day of November, 1844, paid the amount thereof.

P. M. BUTLER, Cherokee Agent.

Showing that the eight mills were duly purchased; but from subsequent investigation made by this office, through Indian Agent John O. Tufts, it appears that evidence of the erection of only one of these mills could be obtained, and nothing is known of what became of the other seven.

The cost of the eight railway corn-mills, with the expense of their erection, should form a basis for an estimate of the amount the Government would have expended had the stipulations of the treaty in that respect been fully executed at the time, as was contemplated, by the appropriation made June 28, 1834. To this amount should be added the interest thereon, not from the 12th of June, 1838, as designated in the Senate resolutions, but from a period not later than the proclamation of the treaty, April 12, 1834, or the date of the appropriation June 28, 1834, until paid. Had the cost of transportation and other expenses incident to their erection been equal to the cost of the mills, the account would stand thus:

Cost of seven mills, $200	$1,400
Cost of erection	1,400
Interest on $2,800 for fifty-two years, at 5 per cent	7,280
	10,080

I therefore think the sum of "$16,000, with interest," an excessive amount to pay for said corn-mills, which is the only claim the Cherokees could have on the Government in consideration of the cession of the Old Cherokee agency in the State of Arkansas.

There is a question as to whether the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokees are entitled to whatever may be due in respect of the corn-mills in question, to the exclusion of other portions of the Cherokee people, or as to whether the whole Cherokee Nation is not entitled to whatever may be found due in that respect.

It would appear by reference to the treaty of 1817 (7 Stats., 156) that the land in Arkansas was granted to that part of the Cherokee Nation then residing on the Arkansas River, now known as the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokees.

The land in Arkansas was ceded to the United States by the treaty of 1828 (Id., 311), by the fourth article of which the Government agreed to erect a grist and saw mill for the Cherokees in their new home (Indian Territory), and in lieu of which the patent railway corn-mills were to be erected as stipulated in the fourth article of the treaty of 1833 (Id., 416).

It is presumed that the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokees base their claim upon the fact that the lands in Arkansas appear, by the treaty of 1817, to have been given them exclusively, and the further fact that the mills were to be erected upon lands in the Indian Territory, for an interest in which they had surrendered their lands in Arkansas. But by reference to the preamble to the treaty of 1828 it will be seen that the purpose of the Government in ceding the lands described in the second article, namely, the lands in Indian Territory, was to secure a permanent home to the whole Cherokee Nation, as well those in Arkansas as those residing east of the Mississippi who might wish to join them in the West; and by reference to the fourth article of the treaty of 1846 (9 Stat., 872) it will be observed that it was therein determined that the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokees had no exclusive title to the land ceded to the Indians by the treaty of 1828, but that the same was intended for the whole Cherokee Nation.

If, then, the land given to the Cherokees by the treaty of 1828 was for the benefit of the whole Cherokee Nation, all benefits accruing under that treaty, unless expressly reserved, belong to the Cherokee Nation, and therefore the Old Settlers or Western Cherokees have no exclusive right to anything that may be due in respect of the aforesaid corn-mills. It is evident that if the mills had been erected in the Indian Territory, as the Government agreed to do, they would have been for the use of the whole nation.

If it be the purpose of the present bill to pay the value of the corn-mills not erected, and cost of transportation and other expenses which would have been incident to their erection, with interest, then, in my opinion, said bill should be so amended as to make the payment to the Cherokee Nation.

I have caused to be draughted a bill intended to meet this view of the case, and, with your concurrence, have the honor to recommend that the same be forwarded with the suggestion that it be adopted as a substitute for Senate bill No. 1601.

For a history of the status of the land known as "The Old Cherokee Agency" I would respectfully refer you to the following public documents (copies of which I am unable to submit), namely: House Report No. 1146, Forty-seventh Congress, first session; House Report No. 2021, Forty-eighth Congress, first session; Senate Report No. 908, Forty-seventh Congress, second session; Senate Report No. 287, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.

I return herewith the communication of Senator DAWES with the bill, and submit herewith a copy of this report and draught of proposed substitute.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

This committee regard the estimate of General Atkins as reasonable and adopt the same, but do not agree to the payment of interest thereon.

Whether this money should be paid to the "Old Settlers" or Western Cherokees or to the Cherokee Nation, is a question not free from difficulty. The honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs concludes that it should go to the nation, but from this opinion this committee are forced to dissent.

The land which was conveyed to the Government as the price of the erection of these mills was the property of the "Old Settler" Cherokees. That part of the tribe residing east of the Mississippi were not parties to the treaty, and while the stipulation to erect a mill provided that it should be placed in the country now occupied by the Cherokee Nation, there is no evidence of any intention to so place the mill for the benefit of the Eastern Cherokees, but it was to be erected in the country to which the Western Cherokees were themselves ready to move.

A circumstance to be considered in this connection is that at that time there was no agreement even with the Eastern Cherokees for their removal, and they did not remove until 1835 to 1837. Under these circumstances it seems that no intention on the part of the Western Cherokees to make the Eastern Cherokees equal beneficiaries in this matter with themselves could be inferred.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill as a substitute for bill S. 1601, and recommend that it pass.

The reading having proceeded to the conclusion of the letter of Acting Secretary Muldrow,

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the reading of the report has gone far enough to show what article of the treaty of 1833, erroneously called 1834 in the amendment, is referred to. On looking at the article, it appears perfectly plain to me that assuming that the United States did not build the mill the article provides for, the amendment, in order to be in order, must be an amendment to carry out that article, and that is to build a mill. So I do not ask for any further reading of the report as far as I am concerned. I think the point is sustained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend the bill on page 108, after line 11, by inserting:

Provided further, That supplies which are the result of prison labor shall not be purchased for use at the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. REAGAN. I make a question of order on that. It is general legislation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a limitation on the expenditure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would hold, without further advice, that this is a legislative direction as to the method of expending money appropriated, and therefore that it is not open to the point of order. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add:

That there be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum not exceeding $15,000, to be expended in the purchase of that part of what is now known as Battery Island Station, containing about 58,300 square feet, situated at the mouth of the Susquehanna River, some 3½ miles below Havre de Grace, Md., now occupied by the United States Fish Commission for a fish-hatching station, under lease from the present owner, Thomas B. Ferguson: Provided, That no part of said purchase money shall be paid until the full and absolute conveyance to the United States of said property and the approval of the same by the Attorney-General.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. I wish to state in regard to this amendment that it provides for the purchase of Battery Island near Havre de Grace, where the principal hatching station is situated for shad. This island has been occupied under lease for some years, and the Government has made quite a large expenditure there, and has all the necessary appliances for prosecuting this very important work. The lease has expired, and the owner of the island proposes to sell it to the Government for the sum of $15,000. The Committee on Fisheries have conferred with the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries on this subject and he strongly favors the purchase, and the committee report it unanimously.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not hear the statement that the Senator made as to the value of the Government improvements upon the island.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. The Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries reports that the Government has expended on the island something like $76,000.

Mr. VEST. We can not hear the Senator.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. The Commissioner reports an expenditure by the Government of some $76,000 upon the island, which would be largely sacrificed if it was given up.

Mr. PLUMB. Then may I ask the Senator how it came that these improvements, and of comparatively permanent character, as I judge they are, because they can not be removed, the Senator says, came to be made upon a tract of land to which the Government had no title?

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. I can only say in reply that the Government held a lease for some years and has occupied the island for some ten years; some six years with the tacit consent of the owner and for the last three years under a lease.

Mr. PLUMB. That lease has expired?

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. That lease has expired.

Mr. PLUMB. In whom is the title to this land?

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. The title of the land is in Mr. Ferguson.

Mr. PLUMB. He is an employé of this department, is he not?

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. He is not now; he was formerly.

Mr. PLUMB. He was at the date these improvements were made on the island?

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. He was deputy fish commissioner at that time.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to be rather a provident transaction on his part altogether, and may perhaps be the occasion of some regret that he is out of the service now.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. I would say to the Senator that Mr. Ferguson claims nothing based upon the value of these improvements. In the judgment of the committee who considered this matter the price at which he proposes to sell the island is a fair price for the property without regard to any improvements which have been made upon it. The Commissioner also states that, in his judgment, it is the best location for a hatchery that can be secured, and he strongly advises the purchase.

Mr. VEST. I wish to ask the Senator a question for information. I understand that this amendment comes from the Committee on Fisheries?

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. It does.

Mr. VEST. I should like to know how the money was appropriated for the improvements on the island. What committee made the report for $76,000? I understand there were $86,000 expended there for buildings, and the Government was paying at the time the nominal rent of a dollar a year.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. That is correct.

Mr. VEST. I want to know what committee here reported in favor of spending $86,000, as I understand it—$76,000 the Senator says—upon real estate to which the Government had not the shadow of title.

Mr. REAGAN. It is about half an acre.

Mr. VEST. I will say to my friend from Texas, it does not make any difference about the size of the island. Here is an extraordinary fact developed. It must have been done upon the report of some committee, because under the general law no Cabinet officer would have a right to direct the expenditure of the money without subjecting himself to impeachment. How was the money expended upon property to which the Government had no title? That is the most extraordinary fact that I have heard here in my service as a Senator.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. I will say in reply to the inquiry of the Senator that I have that information in a book before me, but I have not sifted it out to present it to the Senate. However, quite a large part of the amount was expended out of the appropriation for rivers and harbors in dredging adjacent to the property. Part of the amount was expended out of the current expenditures made for fish and fisheries, but a large proportion of it was made out of the river and harbor appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the river.

Mr. VEST. But I understood the Senator to say—I have no personal knowledge about it—that a large amount of this money was expended for buildings.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. Oh, no; for improvements.

Mr. VEST. What sort of improvements?

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. If I said "buildings" I spoke inadvertently. There was comparatively a very small part of the money expended in buildings.

Mr. VEST. How much?

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. The Government has built a timber protection about the island. There was a large excavation made which was necessary for the transaction of business, and the earth which was excavated was deposited within timber embankments, so as to increase the size of the island.

Mr. VEST. Has the Senator any knowledge as to what this property was worth prior to the improvements, and what has been the increase of value by reason of the money spent there by the Government?

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. I will state that nothing is asked for the betterments which have been made upon the property. The same price per foot is asked for the property that the Government paid for a small amount of ground upon the island for the purpose of erecting a light-house. The same price per foot is asked for the old survey, not including the accretions which have been made by the operation of the improvements. The committee were satisfied that this property would readily command the price which the owner asks for it, and that it was a reasonable sum and not based upon the value of any improvements which the Government has put upon it.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to say that the little affection I have had heretofore for river and harbor bills has been somewhat taken away altogether by the statement made by the Senator from Michigan that the improvement of this island, which has resulted in the necessity for its purchase in order to save the Government from loss, and probably its purchase at a price larger than its original value, was the work of a river and harbor bill which, not satisfied with the ordinary jurisdiction it covers, which is quite broad, has got into this business.

Mr. VEST. I suppose I ought to take my share of blame for not knowing everything that comes from the committee of which I am a member. I am a member of the Committee on Commerce. I have worked on that river and harbor bill, but I never heard of that appropriation before. I never before heard that there was any improvement of private property made by the Government in any river and harbor bill, or I should have opposed it in committee and in the Senate.

If this thing was in any river and harbor bill, and I am curious to know in what phrase it was put there, I should like to know the terms of the appropriation. I never heard of it before. It may have been my negligence. I have tried, I may say without self-praise, to do my duty on that committee, but I never heard before that there was ever any such expenditure as $86,000 upon any island or half-acre of land in connection with fish and fisheries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I happen to have a little knowledge about this matter, which came to me incidentally, after Professor Baird, who was the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, died. There was a struggle, as there always is in this civil-service country of ours, for the honor of being the successor to Professor Baird. Major Ferguson had been the assistant commissioner of fish and fisheries for three or four years, appointed under a special act of Congress authorizing an assistant commissioner.

As the chairman of the Committee on Fisheries has said, Major Ferguson while a citizen of Maryland bought this island from the State, or somebody who owned it. It was a low, almost water-washed island.

It happened to lie right in the line of navigation below Havre de Grace, where the iron railway bridge of the Pennsylvania road crosses the mouth of the Susquehanna, along which a great number of coal steamers, principally, and sailing vessels come to Havre de Grace to load up, which is a great coal-moving place, as everybody knows. In some river and harbor bill or bills, about which I know nothing and therefore can not speak, there was a provision, and, so far as river and harbor bills go, an obviously proper one, for clearing out that channel.

Mr. VEST. That was all right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This little island had been occupied at one time by the State of Maryland, when Major Ferguson was her commissioner of fisheries, for shad hatching. It is one of the most favorable localities for it, where probably the largest number of shad have been successfully hatched of any place in the United States. Putting their two forces together a small appropriation out of which Professor Baird could build a wooden structure, etc., for carrying on the fish hatching, and the clearing of that channel, instead of dredging up and carrying it off 3 or 4 miles somewhere to dump it on shore, they put in wooden cribs not a dozen rods from the place of the dredging, or perhaps less, and dumped the sand and the mud over inside of those wooden cribs to hold it, and thus protected the shores of the island and made the little structures for the purpose of fish hatching able to stand and to be used, so that the fish vessels and the coal vessels could come alongside, the coal vessels coming there, as I say, in great numbers.

Any one every day when he goes to or comes from New York can see a great number of vessels lying there loaded with coal and a great number filled up to go away.

How much money was spent for the building I do not know, but everybody who knew Professor Baird, the purest and most scrupulous man I ever knew, must see that it must have been a very small item. How much the engineers spent in clearing that channel and building the crib and dumping the mud over into it I do not know. It was certainly cheaper than it could have been done by carrying it anywhere else, because it was right at hand.

I ought to add a word, as Major Ferguson has been referred to, in justice to him, although he was a gallant rebel soldier. I should not say "although," but keeping in mind that fact, whatever prejudice an extreme Northern man and black Republican may have, of course would not be in his favor. After Professor Baird died and the scandal was started in the newspapers about the misuse of money in junketing expeditions and all sorts of screeds of that kind, the President of the United States had an investigation made on his own account, as he had a perfect right to do, and as it was his duty to do, as the Commissioner reported to him, to know what had been the conduct, not only of Major Ferguson as Fish Commissioner, but of Professor Baird also, although nobody had ever suggested that Professor Baird could have been otherwise guilty than by inadvertence. I have not seen the report that the three gentlemen selected by the President to make the investigation made to him, but one of them, a gentleman of the highest respectability and of the most astute intelligence and care, and not having any extreme sympathy with Major Ferguson either, informed me that the report of that investigating commission of the President's, unanimously made and in writing, as everybody knew it would, entirely exonerated Professor Baird from ever having spent or used a penny of public money, or a pound of public coal, or a Government baked potato for anybody who came to visit him.

He had always with the most scrupulous overcare and fidelity charged everything of that kind up to himself. Even when Senate committeemen investigating the fisheries went to Wood's Holl, where Professor Baird's headquarters were at the time he died, to spend a night there to make inquiries about the fishing business, we were the guests of Professor Baird, and his money and not that of the United States paid for our food and our lodging. Not only that, but the commission reported that Mr. Ferguson's conduct had been in every respect scrupulously honest and honorable, and that there was not a stain or a suspicion of stain upon any of his connection with any of his transactions that the newspaper stories had given out. I think it is due to him to say that.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear what the Senator from Vermont has said, and he has forestalled in a great part, and in a great deal better manner than I could have said it, what I proposed to say.

This island was bought by Major Ferguson a good many years ago, for it was a very famous ducking and fishing station. Professor Baird thinking it was a very admirable position for a hatchery, proposed to rent it. Major Ferguson with a very great sense of delicacy, as he was assistant fish commissioner, declined to rent it to the Government, though at that very time he was offered $600 a year for the rent of the place for fishing purposes, and the ducking privileges were very great besides. He told Professor Baird, however, that he might make a lease at a nominal rent of a dollar a year and use it for the Government. Professor Baird did that; he established a fish hatchery there, and it has become the most successful hatchery in the United States.

As the chairman of the Committee on Fisheries will tell you, we had the present Fish Commissioner before us and he said that more shad had been hatched there this season than at any other place in America. We put the question to him as to the improvements on the place. If the Government does not choose to keep it they have six months to remove their improvements, but the present Commissioner tells us that if those buildings were removed they would be practically worthless.

Mr. TELLER. They are cheap buildings, are they not?

Mr. HAMPTON. No, they are not cheap buildings.

Mr. TELLER. They are frame buildings?

Mr. HAMPTON. I do not know as to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have seen them. I think they are small wooden structures.

Mr. HAMPTON. They can not be used for anything else, and it would be not only a loss of the cost of the buildings but a loss of all the work that the Government has done in protecting the island.

The question that then came before the committee was whether it was better for us to recommend the purchase of the island at $15,000 or whether the United States should lose $85,000. As to the value of the island, I will state that it was sold at auction, before Major Ferguson bought it, for $10,000, and he has informed me that if the Government does not wish to take it he can name a club that would give for the year's ducking privileges double that amount. But with the high sense of honor and of delicacy which has marked all his transactions with the Government, he said that if they wished to take it they might do so at precisely the price per foot—at the same rate the Government had paid to the former owners for the site of the light-house now upon it. That would make within a fraction of $15,000.

I will state as another evidence of Major Ferguson's delicacy in this matter that the steamer Halcyon was bought, and if I am not mistaken the money was appropriated to pay for it; but other uses were found for it, and when he was dropped as Fish Commissioner that vessel was thrown back on his hands. He asked me to go with him to the President to say that if the Government wanted it they might take it at exactly what it cost him, but at the same time he showed the President a telegram from New York in which he was offered $17,000 for the vessel, $5,000 or $6,000 more than he asked the Government for it. He is doing precisely the same thing now with this island that he did with the vessel.

Mr. TELLER. I visited this island some five or six years ago. I think the buildings are of wood and of material that will be practically of no value if taken off the island. It seems to me that the Government could not afford to take the material off the island, and that really the Government ought to buy the island. I do not know anything about the value of the island, that is, whether it is worth $15,000 or $25,000, but certainly it is a very valuable location for the purpose for which it has been used. I do not suppose the Government could probably duplicate it for the money that it has spent there and the money that it is proposed to charge for the island. In fact I doubt whether the Government could find in that vicinity anywhere so valuable a place for the purpose for which this island has been used. If the committee are satisfied that $15,000 is a fair price, it does not seem to me that there ought to be much question about the Government buying it.

Mr. DAWES. I joined as one of the Committee on Fisheries in this recommendation with great cheerfulness, the more so because I had been somewhat prejudiced against Major Ferguson, growing out of the contest for the succession to Professor Baird. There had been a good deal of talk before the Committee on Fisheries in regard to these improvements upon his island that the Government had no real hold on; but I must confess that my examination of the matter in the Committee on Fisheries very much changed my mind in reference to Major Ferguson. I have seen no more honorable transaction than that of his in connection with the island and his offer to sell it to the Government.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question for information. I made no charge against either Professor Baird or Major Ferguson.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say that I have not heard the discussion, and I do not know anything that has been said in reference to it except what was said by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] after I returned to the Chamber.

Mr. VEST. I am a personal friend of Major Ferguson, as to that matter, and I signed his petition to have him appointed Fish Commissioner. But I wanted to know whether it was possible that I had helped to prepare and had voted for a river and harbor bill that expended eighty-odd thousand dollars of Government money on an island in the Susquehanna River for the purpose of hatching fish, and that I did not know it. I never heard of any such appropriation, and I do not know yet from anything any Senator has said here how the dams to hatch fish there were paid for under an appropriation in the river and harbor bill. I can understand very well how money was taken for the channel; that was all right; but I do not understand the other uses to which it was applied.

Mr. DAWES. Let me state what I desire to say, and then I will leave the floor to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. Oh, I do not want the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Here is about half an acre, an island, in the center of which the United States already owns sufficient for a light-house. It may go into other people's hands, and then the United States will be upon an island on which somebody else owns everything except enough for the light-house.

Mr. TELLER. How did we get the land for the light-house?

Mr. DAWES. We got that by negotiations with the original owner, not with Mr. Ferguson. Here is a square piece right in the center of it which belongs to the United States. What those who executed the commission of the river and harbor bill did has been described by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. VEST. That was for the channel.

Mr. DAWES. That was for the channel, but they had to put what they took out of the channel somewhere, and they put it in the nearest possible spot, and that was by the side of the island, and so protected the island, and after it was there Professor Baird utilized it, and enlarged the island with it.

Mr. VEST. Where did the money come from to do that?

Mr. DAWES. There was no fault on the part of Major Ferguson.

Mr. TELLER. Do the eighty-odd thousand dollars used on the island include the cost of filling it up from the channel?

Mr. DAWES. I suppose some of the expenditure is accounted for in that way; I do not know that it is all so accounted for; but upon this enlargement of the island Professor Baird doubtless expended a great deal of money, utilizing it necessarily for the purpose for which the island was intended, and he made there the best hatching place there is.

After all that has transpired, when this man had it in his power either to exact an enormous sum from the United States or subject the United States to an enormous loss, he offers this island for this reasonable amount. When I came into the committee-room of the Committee on Fisheries, understanding all that had transpired before, I had no idea we could get the island for $15,000. I had supposed if we got it at all we should have to pay $30,000, and I do not hesitate to say that it would be better for us to pay $30,000 for that island than to let it go, and let all we have done there go with it.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. I shall not detain the Senate to say anything further with regard to the desirableness of the location of the island or the conduct of Major Ferguson in connection with it, or anything of that kind. I will simply refer the Senator from Missouri to the fact that in 1881 there was an appropriation in the river and harbor bill of $6,954.15 expressly for work at that point.

Mr. VEST. Yes; that was on the channel.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. And appropriations were made at subsequent dates. I read from the last report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries:

In addition to the improvements mentioned above, which were made at the expense of the commission, $5,000 were spent in deepening the channel and in extending and strengthening the piers and breakwaters. This included the building of a crib or breakwater 495 feet long, extending from the southwest part of the island to form an inclosure for raising carp. This work was done by the Engineer Corps of the Army in accordance with the provisions of the river and harbor bill approved July 5, 1884.

There are several other citations of the same kind in the report, referring to specific appropriations in the river and harbor bills. Quite a large part of the expenditure there was made in pursuance of those appropriations, made expressly for the purpose, and then the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries made other expenditures.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will pardon me, I was on the Committee on Commerce, and what I asked about was as to the terms of the appropriation in the river and harbor bill. I know very well that the committee recommended appropriations for improving that channel. We unquestionably made appropriations and the Corps of Engineers superintended the work as to channel improvements. What I asked about was the expenditure on the island to construct fish-ponds and so on, with which the river and harbor bill certainly had nothing to do. That was not within our province.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. Those expenditures were made out of the appropriations for the Fish Commission.

Mr. VEST. But the statement was made here that the money was appropriated by the river and harbor bill. I simply wanted to say that I never heard of any such appropriation for fish and fisheries.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. The statement made in the report is that there were specific appropriations at that time.

Mr. VEST. There is no question about appropriations having been made at the time for the channel.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE. There is no question about that. There is no question, I think, as to the propriety of buying this island and of the fact that the price proposed to be paid for it is low.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Vermont to propose an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, a mere phrase about the legal title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 11, of the amendment, after the word "conveyance," it is proposed to insert "of a perfect title thereto;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no part of said purchase-money shall be paid until the full and absolute conveyance of a perfect title thereto to the United States of said property and the approval of the same by the Attorney-General.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. After line 24, on page 74, I move to insert:

That the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated to bore, construct, and equip an artesian well at the United States arsenal, in the village of Summerville, near the city of Augusta, Ga., the money to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN. The Augusta arsenal is located on an elevated position near the city of Augusta, Ga. I believe it is the only arsenal now maintained in the Southern States east of the Mississippi River. The location is very eligible and the position in every way all that could be desired.

There has always been more or less difficulty, however, about getting water enough for the uses of the arsenal. The common well that has been dug there is from 175 to 200 feet deep, I understand, and the supply is still rather inadequate. There is from $150,000 to $200,000 worth of Government property there, which would be entirely at the mercy of the flames in case of fire, as there would be no chance with the present supply of water to protect it.

In that section of country, not immediately in Augusta, but in the lower portion of Georgia, there has been no difficulty about securing water by boring artesian wells. It is not anticipated that there will be any difficulty in boring a well as contemplated at the arsenal near Augusta. The water supply is very inadequate, and it is very necessary to have a better supply, and practically it must be had in some manner. The people there and the officer in charge and some of us on this floor think the better way to secure the necessary supply would be to bore an artesian well at once and get a bountiful supply. It is believed that it can be done for $10,000, the sum mentioned in the amendment.

This is, I believe, about all I care to say on the subject. It is a necessity, and the officer in charge is very anxious about it. I trust there will be no objection on the part of the Senate to inserting the provision in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I feel compelled to make a point of order on the amendment. It was not estimated for and was not reported from any committee.

Mr. BROWN. I beg the Senator's pardon. It was not reported from a committee, but it was referred to the committee of which the Senator is chairman some time since.

Mr. ALLISON. I know it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but it was not estimated for.

Mr. BROWN. It is estimated for as much, I presume, as any other portion of the appropriations for arsenals. In the event that the water supply is entirely exhausted at the arsenal, I suppose the appropriation would necessarily and incidentally cover the digging of a well or the procuring in some manner of a proper supply of water, and it is not necessary to have a separate estimate for that purpose. If the well had gone entirely dry and it was necessary to appropriate $100 to dig a common well, I suppose it would not be necessary to have an estimate from the Department before an appropriation could be made. If one of the kitchens had been burned down belonging to the commandant's house, and it was necessary to build another, we should not need an estimate by the Department to have it done, but it would come under the general appropriation as one of the necessary incidents for protecting the property and taking care of the comfort of the force there.

I do not think, therefore, that by any just rule you can say it is necessary to estimate for every little item. Let us see how that matter stands in reference to some other arsenals provided for in the bill. I turn to page 70, under "Armories and arsenals," and I find among other things:

Office furniture and fixtures, and connecting water arrangements with elevated tank and reservoir, $9,000.

That is one of the provisions already in the bill for another arsenal, where connecting the water arrangements is specifically appropriated for. I do not suppose there is any special estimate for that particular portion of the expense at the Rock Island arsenal.

Then, again, I find under the head of "Rock Island bridge:"

For the immediate construction of a temporary dam to furnish water-power for said arsenal, and to be used as a coffer-dam when the permanent dam is reconstructed, $275,000.

There the water supply and bridge come in, which is one of the incidents of taking care of the arsenal. It is one of the necessities of appropriation, and though it is a very large sum it was agreed to without any hesitation by the committee.

I suppose the chairman will hardly state that he has an estimate for every little item of expenditure at the arsenals. This is simply an item to bore a well so as to procure a supply of water.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa insist upon his point of order?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; I believe not.

Mr. CULLOM. He withdraws it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa withdraws the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. On page 3, after line 12, I move to insert:

For court-house and post-office, Omaha, Nebr.: Paying the city of Omaha for paving of streets and alleys adjacent to said building, heretofore paid for by the city of Omaha, $3,017.75.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. On page 67, after line 8, I move to insert:

To pay John F. Cook the balance due him as collector of taxes for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, $1,000.

Mr. BECK. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say that this amendment is covered by the fourth clause of the sixteenth rule. It happened to be an omission in appropriating for a salary provided for by existing law. I will read the clause of the rule so that the Senate will see that it covers the amendment.

Mr. BECK. Does not the item belong to the District appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, not at all. The fourth clause of Rule XVI provides that—

No amendment, the object of which is to provide for a private claim, shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

I have here a letter from the District commissioners which will explain the amendment in a few words. The commissioners of the District of Columbia state that the law expressly provided a salary of $4,000 for the collector.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me make a suggestion about the proposed payment. The amendment provides that it shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, but the salary of the collector of taxes is payable out of the funds of the District of Columbia, derived one-half from taxation and the remainder from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is the case, I have no objection to having the payment provided for in that way. The clause immediately preceding in the bill provides "one-half of said sum to be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. PLUMB. Then the amendment should take a place so as to become subject to that provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to add that clause to the amendment. There is no doubt about this amount being due, and that the omission to pay it was an oversight. I should like to have the letter of the commissioners read so that it will appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF COMMISSIONERS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, July 24, 1888.

SIR: The commissioners have the honor to make the following response to the resolution of the Senate of 23d instant, directing them to report the balance due, if any, to John F. Cook, as collector of taxes for the District for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888.

The only claim for a balance of that character of which the commissioners have knowledge, is for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1880, which they presume is intended by the resolution, and that the year 1888 contained in said resolution is an inadvertence.

The claim aforesaid is based upon the several laws providing for the office of collector of taxes by which the salary of that officer is fixed at $4,000 per annum. The appropriation for the salary of this office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880 (volume 20, pages 405, United States Statutes at Large), was only $3,000, while all the preceding and subsequent appropriations therefor by Congress were for the amount prescribed by law, namely, $4,000.

The commissioners are aware of no reason for this reduction.

Very respectfully,

S. E. WHEATLEY,
Acting President Board Commissioners, District of Columbia.

Hon. JOHN J. INGALLS,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. This a deficiency——

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. All I wish to add is that to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, that this is to be paid partly out of the District treasury, I will adopt as part of the amendment the words which are found in lines 6, 7, and 8, on page 67, so as to make it conform to other appropriations in the bill for the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words to be added to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment the following words:

One-half of said sum to be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON. This may be a proper amendment. I do not know precisely the situation as respects Mr. Cook's salary. This is the first time my attention has been called to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment was referred to your committee.

Mr. ALLISON. When was it referred?

Mr. SHERMAN. A week or two ago.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, it was referred to our committee and we passed it over, I remember, for consideration on the deficiency bill. It clearly does not belong to this bill, whatever else may happen to it. It is a deficiency for a prior year. It is not for the expenditures of the current fiscal year.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will not object to placing the amendment on this bill. I may forget it if it is passed over now.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be sure to give it attention. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to one difficulty which I am afraid may lie in this amendment; and that is, if we adopt it we shall make a precedent which will apply to a thousand other officers, because we have been appropriating in various appropriation bills since 1876 less sums than the statutes provided in the way of salaries. If Mr. Cook's case comes in that category I shall not be willing to make this appropriation for him; but if it shall turn out that for some reason there was an omission in the statutes of 1880, whereby he only received $3,000 when he should have received $4,000, I will see that it is placed on the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish the Senator to have all the facts before him, and then I hope that we shall agree to put the amendment on this bill. There is a letter on the files which I have just sent for, which ought to have been printed, from Mr. Cook himself, in which he sets out that this does not fall within any of the classes of cases to which the Senator from Iowa refers; but that it was an oversight. I have no doubt it is a correct statement that he makes.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order that this is a deficiency. The amendment will have attention in connection with the deficiency bill, I promise the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not a point of order, but if the Senator says he will look into it I do not want to press it now.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator will remember that the habit of the House of Representatives was, upon a change of the political complexion of that body, to reduce the salaries of nearly all the bureau officers. The salaries of nearly all were reduced below the amount fixed by the permanent law of the land. That was carried on, and many of the salaries have never been restored to this date. They have been from time to time advanced towards the amount of the statutory salary, and some of them have got up to the full measure required by the statute; but I have no doubt that if this is the character of claim which it appears to be, and which I suspect it is from the fact that Mr. Cook has been so patient, waiting eight years before making any disclosure about it, it will involve the payment to certainly ten thousand people of sums to make up the differences between the amount appropriated for their salaries in the respective appropriation bills and the amount named in the statute for the offices which they respectively held.

Mr. SHERMAN. The letter will explain the whole matter, and will show the Senator that it is not one of the cases to which he refers.

Mr. PLUMB. I will require something more than Mr. Cook's mere statement, especially in view of the fact that he waited eight years, right under the view of Congress all the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. His answer to that is reasonable, that he had gone out of the office, and did not press the matter at the time, and did not know what was justly due him. Let his letter be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio call for the reading of the letter?

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the reading of the letter. It is the letter on which his claim is founded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

No. 1005 SIXTEENTH STREET, WASHINGTON, D. C.,
May 28, 1888.

HONORABLE SIR: By the act of the first Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia (session first, chapter 108, section 7, folios 142 et seq.), approved August 23, 1871, the salary of the collector of taxes for said District was fixed at $5,000, which provision of law was amended by act of Congress, approved June 20, 1874 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 18, chapter 337, proviso to section 2, folios 116 and 117), by a reduction of 20 per cent., thereby making said salary $4,000 per annum.

There has been no other subsequent amendment or repeal of this provision of law, and for all years subsequent to this amendment the appropriations have been in accordance to said act as so amended in the sum of $4,000 per annum for the salary of said collector, except in the appropriation made for said officer in the act of March 3, 1879 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 20, chapter 182, section 3, folio 405), for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, when by some mistake or failure to appropriate in accordance with law only $3,000 was appropriated.

I respectfully ask, impelled so to do from a sense of what is fairly and justly due, that the balance so due me under the act creating and continuing the office, and providing the salary, and as amended by Congress, and as failed to be provided for in full in the act of March 3, 1879, or in any subsequent act, may be provided for my use, and that the same may be included in the provisions of the sundry civil or general deficiency appropriation bill of this session.

A note of inquiry addressed to the honorable commissioners for said District will confirm the foregoing statement, and the books of the office of the auditor of said District will show the same correct.

With respect, yours,

JOHN F. COOK.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN.

Mr. PLUMB. On Mr. Cook's own statement this is precisely the case to which I referred. It is absolutely on all fours, upon Mr. Cook's statement, with thousands of other cases which we shall be in-mediately called upon to meet by an appropriation for deficiencies of salaries and so on.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why should he not have the salary given to him by law?

Mr. PLUMB. One reason is because the law-making power changed its mind in regard to the salary that year and determined that he should have but $3,000, and it changed the law to that effect, as the Supreme Court decided it was perfectly competent for it to do. Of course there may be some other fact which does not appear there, which would take this case out of the category and entitle him to the money, although the fact that he waited for eight years makes me think that it is the precise case which I think it is. At all events, it ought to be investigated before we go into it, to determine whether the Senate is prepared now to say that we will pay the difference in amount to every Indian agent, to every consul, to every minister, to every head of a bureau, and to every other official whose salary has been reduced in appropriation bills below the amount named in the permanent statutes.

Mr. BECK. Each appropriation bill contains a provision that whatever they are allowed shall be in full for the services of that year.

Mr. PLUMB. But that was inserted two or three years ago to cover the possible effect of an anticipated decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me, I had occasion to examine this question, because precisely a similar case to the one suggested by the Senator from Ohio was referred to me as a subcommittee. I find in the legislative appropriation bill that for the last twelve or eighteen years (I do not remember the precise date; it certainly commenced as far back as 1876) there is a distinct provision that the sums appropriated for the various objects of appropriation shall be in full satisfaction. Although nearly every salary appropriated for in that bill for the last twelve or more years has been lower than the salary fixed by general law, the bill distinctly provides that it shall be in full compensation for the services.

The Senator from Kansas is quite right when he says that upon the principle suggested by the Senator from Ohio there are at least a thousand cases, that would amount to many thousands of dollars, which would be involved if we entered on this system of legislation now—making good those salaries. I do not think the provision appears, however, in an appropriation bill except the legislative bill—the provision that it shall be in full satisfaction—but it does appear in each of the legislative appropriation bills for the last twelve or more years.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that the Supreme Court has decided that question, and decided that a provision in an appropriation bill providing for the payment of a less amount is, in fact, fixing the salary. Pro tanto it is a repeal of the other, and the words suggested by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] are not necessary at all. The very fact that we say the officer shall be paid $2,000 where the salary is $2,500, the Supreme Court say, is the end of it, and that he is not entitled to the difference.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the first place, no such provision has been quoted as in the law of 1879. The provision referred to was in a subsequent law. I am perfectly willing to let this go over and let the Committee on Appropriations examine it, but I am satisfied that this salary being fixed by law it ought to be paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; and let it go back to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken if there be no objection.

Mr. STEWART. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 57, after the word "dollars," in line 22, it is proposed to insert:

That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used in the investigation of any case, or the prosecution of any person, in the mountain regions of the United States for cutting or removing for domestic purposes dwarfed or scrub timber unfit to be sawed or hewn into lumber of commercial value.

Mr. STEWART. This does not change the law as it has been understood for the last thirty or forty years in the mining regions in the interior of the country. The miners have been in the habit of cutting the scrub timber that was scattered about in the clefts of the mountains for the purpose of fuel. They also used the sage-brush for that purpose. The timber would never be available if it were not for the mining done in the region, nobody would be there. This confines it to scrub timber. Timber that can not be made into boards or hewed can not have much value. An act was passed some years ago intended to cover this precise deficiency, which act I will read:

An act authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all citizens of the United States and other persons, bona fide residents of the State of Colorado, or Nevada, or either of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Wyoming, Dakota, Idaho, or Montana, and all other mineral districts of the United States, shall be, and are hereby, authorized and permitted to fell and remove, for building, agricultural, mining, or other domestic purposes, any timber or other trees growing or being on the public lands, said lands being mineral, and not subject to entry under existing laws of the United States, except for mineral entry, in either of said States, Territories, or districts of which such citizens or persons may be at the time bona fide residents, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe for the protection of the timber and of the undergrowth growing upon such lands, and for other purposes: Provided, The provisions of this act shall not extend to railroad corporations.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the register and the receiver of any local land office in whose district any mineral land may be situated to ascertain from time to time whether any timber is being cut or used upon any such lands, except for the purposes authorized by this act, within their respective land districts; and, if so, they shall immediately notify the Commissioner of the General Land Office of that fact; and all necessary expenses incurred in making such proper examinations shall be paid and allowed such register and receiver in making up their next quarterly accounts.

SEC. 3. Any person or persons who shall violate the provisions of this act, or any rules and regulations in pursuance thereof made by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $500, and to which may be added imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

There is a question whether this law shall have a narrow construction, so as to be confined to the cutting of timber upon the mining claims, or whether it was manifestly intended, as it was understood for years and acted upon by all parties, to cover the mineral region where they have been cutting this timber. It will be observed that the act itself allows them to cut for building purposes; and the amendment only prohibits prosecution with the use of this money for such timber as is not fit for building purposes—material that has no commercial value for timber, either in a hewn or sawed state. It simply prevents prosecution with this money for cutting scrub timber.

I offer this for the reason that some question has arisen in the last year with regard to which there is a difference of opinion. I think it would be well to guard this appropriation—it is a large one, $75,000—so that all parties may be advised, and so that no misunderstanding shall occur and no oppression be practiced. There were a few arrests made in Nevada during the last year, but the court discharged the men, and I understand that there has been some other investigation. I do not apprehend any convictions, because it has been sanctioned so thoroughly for years. But still, in making a large appropriation like $75,000 for this purpose, it might as well be so fixed that there can be no misunderstanding about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment already adopted, on page 46, after line 7, it is proposed to add:

Ten thousand dollars, to be expended, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the discovery and the recovery of the property of the United States held in adverse possession to the Government.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Florida will make some explanation of the amendment, and show where it is estimated for, and so on.

Mr. CALL. That amendment, Mr. President, is offered in pursuance of existing law, and is of a character that perhaps it would be better if it had not been made a subject of public discussion. However, I will state that information has been placed before the Senate from the Treasury Department exhibiting the fact that there is some valuable property of the Government held in adverse possession, and that there is no legal reason why it may not be recovered. The evidence is before the Senate.

I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was advised of it. It was brought to the attention of the Government through some distinguished officers of the Navy of the United States, and I can see no possible reason why this money should not be placed at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose.

The evidence is abundant, and the subject has come to the attention of the Government through some of the most distinguished officers of the Navy. If it is necessary to enter more fully into the subject I shall be entirely willing to do so, but I take it that the public interest will be entirely served by accepting the facts as contained in the papers which are before the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask that the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The amendment of Mr. CALL was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this is not the first time that such appropriations have been asked for and that such appropriations have been granted. Years ago various provisions of law were enacted to authorize contracts to be make to find out and recover Confederate property. Probably just at the close of the war they were useful, because certain property was recovered, but in most cases the cost was more than the outcome. I think this provision, if the Secretary of the Treasury is prevailed upon to use it, will result simply in giving some gentleman a pleasure trip to Europe to look around for property that if described would be probably of no avail.

I have read something of this matter in the newspapers lately, to the effect that some vessel had been built for the Confederate service and become private property, or was taken under a private name by some persons having claims against the Confederate government, and that, as it is claimed now that the United States is the heir at law to the property of the Confederate government, we might recover that vessel. A moment's reflection must convince Senators that the hope is an illusive one.

Twenty-three years have elapsed since the close of the Confederacy; its vessels have gone into private hands, and the probability, therefore, is that they are worn out and wasted in service, and also that they have passed through many hands. There is no probability whatever of the Government ever recovering this vessel. If it were property in England the uniform decisions of the courts of England have been against the recovery of such property. The matter went to the highest courts there, and it was held that this property and all property of the Confederate States in England was subject to the debts of the Confederate States, and it was decided that this property would go for the payment of those debts, because much of the debt was held abroad, but that the property of the United States was also held abroad for the debts of the Confederate States; that if we took their property we were to be responsible for their debts.

While I was Secretary of the Treasury we tried to recover property of that kind, and we are constantly advised by the chief law officers of the Government not to allow a decision to be arrived at; that it was better to abandon such property rather than attempt to reclaim it. Now, after twenty-three years, this apparition appears again, and we are asked to send a messenger over there to recover it, and to expend $10,000 for that purpose, without the slightest chance of getting anything in return.

The amount is small, it is true, and might be paid out of the Treasury without any great loss; but I think we had better not expend it. I think we had better let the Confederate property go, wherever it is. If we should ever recover it we should recover it with all the responsibility involved.

Mr. EVARTS. As the Senator from Ohio has referred to the subject, and the motion is made to appropriate this money, I desire to say that very early after the close of the rebellion a question was raised as to whether this Government should pursue some considerable masses of property, altogether perhaps in England, that had been and were the property of the Confederate States.

Some very eminent lawyers in the confidence of the administration advised that that course should be taken. I advised against it and refused any countenance whatever to the proceedings. Although efforts were made to draw a distinction between true succession to a decayed and defunct government which would carry obligations for its unsatisfied debts, I was not able to see it and have always advised against it. The experiment was made, however, to a certain extent, under the direction and advice of the lawyers to whom I have referred, and it went through the courts in England with a considerable scrutiny, but as far as I can now recall and as far as the courts proceeded the English tribunals, I think, never went any further than to say that if the United States were the successors of the Confederate States we must pay their debts before we took this property out of England. That is my view of the situation.

Mr. CALL. Why the Senators here should assume in the advance of an investigation sought to be made a state of facts to preclude and prevent an investigation seems to me to be somewhat strange.

Suppose a vessel built by the Confederate States, and paid for, was under charter at the termination of the war, and the charter parties having rendered service neither to the Government of the United States nor to the Confederate States, as we call them—suppose a party of that kind, availing himself of the opportunity of committing a fraud, should remain in possession of that vessel, an ironclad superior to anything in our Navy, and it should be found in the West Indies and reported by a distinguished admiral, as the facts show in this case, to be there ready to menace the possessions of the United States in the event of war, why should not that private property held by a man that has no claim upon either Government be recovered by the United States, which by law has declared it to be the property of the United States?

Here are the Revised Statutes, as the Senator from Ohio knows, time and time again declaring that property under those circumstances belongs to the United States, and that it was the duty of the President of the United States to recover it. Here is the statute (I suppose it is familiar to every one) imposing that duty on the President and in force to-day. Why should it not be enforced? Will it be pretended by the Senator from New York that any lawyer or any court has ever said that for the United States to assert its right against that property, that ship, would burden it with the debt of the Confederacy?

There might have been a decision in England very properly, and in any country, that the lien of the creditor on the article created by his labor remained, whether against the Confederate States Government or the United States or any one else, but there is no court that has decided—I venture and I challenge the production of such a decision—and no lawyer that ever has asserted that a victorious Government became the successors to the debts of the conquered people. Why, Mr. President, should we embarrass so clear a case as this with an assumption of that kind?

Now, the facts upon which this amendment is predicated are simply these: That a distinguished admiral of this country pointed out a vessel asserted to have been notoriously built and paid for and not subject to any lien, and it is asserted that there is also an immense amount of other property as to which no settlement has ever been passed, and nothing can be said in opposition to the proposed amendment but the vague and general declarations of the Senator from Ohio on the subject. It is asserted that there are millions upon millions of dollars' worth of property involved, and the law stands here to-day imposing upon every Senator and upon the President of the United States the duty of this investigation.

Why shall we shield people that have no meritorious claim on either Government? Why, at least, shall there not be an investigation of the facts? That is all we ask for here. Why this solicitude in the very advance of an inquiry into the subject that it shall be hushed up?

Who is to be hurt by it? There is no imputation upon any one, and if there is any person in possession of property which was paid for with the money of the Confederate States, it ought to be disclosed, more particularly if it is some person who was never actuated by any sentiment of patriotism on either side. I undertake to say that the evidence in this case before the committee of the Senate shows the statements I have made to be true and upon unimpeachable testimony—testimony of gentlemen of character, who are personally acquainted with the facts in the case.

I therefore ask that this amendment authorizing an appropriation for an inquiry be adopted, in pursuance of the existing law to carry out a duty imposed by the statute upon the President of the United States, the facts being shown in the papers now before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Did I understand the Senator from Florida to say that there was a report here from the Treasury Department giving information and showing that——

Mr. CALL. That there were papers? Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to see them.

Mr. CALL. There is a large mass of them. The Senator has had opportunity to see them for several days.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have wanted to see them. Where are those papers?

Mr. ALLISON. The papers will be here in a moment.

Mr. COCKRELL. This, Mr. President, is a proposition to appropriate $10,000 for the discovery of property alleged to have belonged to the Confederate States and therefore to belong now to the United States. This is not a new question before Congress. The fairy tales that have been told of the wealth of the defunct Confederacy, some twenty-odd years after its collapse, are only equaled by the fables we hear of the immense wealth stored in England belonging to American heirs. According to these reports as to estates in England that belong to heirs in America, the amounts, if added together, would be equivalent to the entire value of all the property, real, personal, and mixed, in England.

This is not a new question, as I have said. On the 26th day of November, in the year 1867, two years and a half after the close of the war, the House of Representatives of the United States passed a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a report in regard to this immense wealth of a dead confederacy, a bankrupt confederacy, and in pursuance of that resolution the Hon. Hugh McCulloch, the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted to the House of Representatives a report dated April 17, 1868, being House Executive Document No. 304, Fortieth Congress, second session—submitted on the 21st day of April, 1868—and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed. Now, sir, in this document, which I hold in my hand, is a detailed statement in regard to this property and the efforts to recover it. The Secretary says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 17, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of November 26, 1867, calling for certain information from this Department concerning efforts for the recovery of Confederate property in Europe, and of contracts with agents or attorneys in relation thereto, and also information concerning a settlement made with the firm of Fraser, Trenholm & Co., to report as follows:

This inquiry involves analyses of numerous and complex legal documents, proceedings, and correspondence regarding the same, the preparation of which has been unavoidably delayed in consequence of other engagements of the special counsel employed—by the Government to superintend those proceedings, as well in Europe as in the United States.

Of the special counsel employed—

I did not understand whether the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] said he was counsel for the Government in those matters or not.

Mr. EVARTS. No. I stated that the subject was matter of consultation with the Government, and eminent lawyers had advised the Government that it was entitled to proceed at law, but I said I had advised against it, and declined to have anything whatever to do with it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I go on:

The exertions of the Government to recover Confederate property abroad have not been confined to Europe, but have been extended to other parts of the world, and especially to the West Indies, in which those exertions have been diligently and successfully prosecuted.

But, as the resolution of the House applies only to such efforts made in Europe, those only will constitute the subject of this communication.

Proceedings to this end commenced soon after the cessation of hostilities in the Southern States.

Not twenty-three years after the war closed, but immediately after the close of the war. The Secretary continues:

The consul for the United States at Liverpool (Mr. Dudley) received information from the consul of the United States at Havana (Mr. Minor) of the shipment at Havana on board the British ship Aline of a cargo of cotton, supposed to belong to the Confederate government and consigned to the commercial house of Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm & Co., at Liverpool, which house consisted professedly of four persons, namely: Theodore D. Wagner, James T. Wellsman, and William L. Trenholm, all citizens of the United States residing at Charleston, S. C., together with Charles K. Prioleau, formerly a citizen of the United States, but now a naturalized subject of Great Britain. Thereupon Mr. Dudley, on the arrival of the cotton at Liverpool, filed a bill in chancery in the name of the United States against the cotton on board, consisting of 1,360 bales or thereabouts, and charged as of the value of £50,000, demanding the same from the consignees as the property of the United States. A copy of the bill is annexed to this report and marked A.

The cause came on for preliminary hearing before Vice-Chancellor Wood, on a motion in behalf of the United States to enjoin the cotton or its proceeds in the hands of Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm & Co.; and on the 25th of July, 1865, after hearing affidavits on both sides, the court was of opinion that the United States were entitled to the relief prayed for, as the successors of the Confederate Government by conquest, but that Messrs. Fraser & Co. held valid liens against the cotton or its proceeds on account of contracts made by them as authorized agents of the Confederate government, and therefore decreed to enjoin only a part of the proceeds and left that in the hands of Mr. Charles K. Prioleau, a member of the firm, he giving bonds to hold and account for the same as receiver of the court.

These proceedings had been instituted by Mr. Dudley of his own motion, under the sense of his public duty, and without opportunity of previous communication with the Department of State.

On receiving information of what had been done, the Secretary of State, with authority of the President, approved and adopted the act in behalf of the United States.

But the grounds on which the court had decided the preliminary question of injunction and the decision itself were deemed to be unsatisfactory and injurious to the United States; it being conceived that any and all public property found in possession of the pretended Confederate government was held by it tortiously as against the Government of the United States; that such property did not come to the United States by right of conquest merely, the same being actual property of the Uuited States, whose tax power had been usurped by rebels in arms; that the proceeds of all taxes levied by the Confederates as a pretended government were and always had been the property of the legitimate sovereign; that by the defeat of the military forces of the Confederates the Government of the United States did not recover possession of what was its own; and that the claims of lien set up by Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm & Co. could not lawfully attach to any property of the Confederates coming into their possession after the final defeat of the Confederates and the dissolution of the so-called Confederate government, on the happening of which dissolution any such pretended agency of Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm & Co. must necessarily expire by operation of law. These considerations were communicated by the Secretary of State to the proper diplomatic and consular representatives of the Government abroad, with instructions to proceed, in conformity therewith, to take steps for the recovery of any pretended public property of the Confederates which might come to their knowledge.

This shows, Mr. President, that all the United States officials abroad, in Europe and the West Indies, were directed to make diligent search, immediately after the surrender, and seize and take all property supposed to belong to the Confederacy.

Counsel were also employed in the United States to collect evidence in all parts of the country, and to advise and direct generally in the prosecution of suits, preparation of pleadings, and instruction of the officers of the Government in Europe.

The result of all these arrangements has been the actual recovery of property of the Confederates to a large amount, with much more which it is confidently believed will in due time be recovered.

Meanwhile, in the suit of the United States against Fraser, Trenholm & Co., the defendants had, on the 28th of November, 1865, put in their answer, a copy of which is hereto annexed and marked B; soon after which the matter became complicated by reason of bills of discovery being filed on the one hand by the United States against Fraser, Trenholm & Co., and on the other by Fraser, Trenholm & Co. against the United States.

On the bill filed against the United States by Fraser, Trenholm & Co. the latter insisted that a sworn answer should be put in by, and in the name of, the President of the United States, or of some other principal officer of the Government. This pretension the United States resisted; and on hearing in the court of chancery, Vice-Chancellor Wood decided that Fraser, Trenholm & Co. had no right to demand such sworn discovery from the President of the United States; but intimated an opinion that the answer should be sworn to by some other principal officer of the Government.

This pretension, also, the United States steadily resisted, showing that such a sworn answer to a bill of discovery could not be demanded in England from any high officer of the British Government, and that no law of the United States authorized any officer thereof to make such sworn discovery in the name of the Government. Accordingly the United States filed an answer to this bill under its great seal, certified by the Secretary of State, which answer and the bill itself are hereto annexed and marked C and D.

Thereupon, Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm & Co. demurred to the bill of discovery filed by the United States, on the ground that the President of the United States was not joined in the suit, and on hearing of the demurrer before Vice-Chancellor Wood, he sustained it and dismissed the bill. But on appeal to the court of appeals in chancery, consisting of the lord chancellor and lords justices, the decision of the vice-chancellor was overruled, and the bill of the United States maintained.

The United States, on the 17th of January, 1867, had filed an amended bill, to which the respondents replied by answer, filed August 28, 1867, of which copies are annexed, marked E and F.

Anterior to this date, Mr. Morse, consul of the United States at London, had, without authority, entered into an agreement with Fraser, Trenholm & Co. for the settlement of the controversy with them; to which act there will be specific reference in the sequel of this report. Founding on that agreement, as constituting an admission by the United States of a large balance of account being due to Fraser, Trenholm & Co., greatly exceeding any assets in their hands, they applied to the court to dismiss the original bill for the recovery of the cargo of the Aline, and might have prevailed in that motion, but for the timely arrival of a communication to the minister of the United States in England, by telegraph, from the Department of State, disavowing the act of Mr. Morse. And although a dismissal of the suit was thus prevented, yet the vice-chancellor was induced, by the tenor of the admissions in the agreement of Mr. Morse, to discharge the sureties of the receiver, leaving the fund on the sole responsibility of Mr. Prioleau.

In view of the persistent and partially successful endeavors of Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm & Co., in England, to evade any accounting, to embarrass the main suit by vexatious delays, to escape proper responsibility, and otherwise to defeat the just claims of the United States, it was deemed expedient to institute proceedings against Messrs. John Fraser & Co., of Charleston, S. C., which consisted, in part or in whole, of the same persons, if not absolutely the same in interest, as the house of Fraser, Trenholm & Co., in Liverpool, but charged in the bill as also comprehending George A. Trenholm, formerly titular secretary of the treasury of the pretended Confederate States. Accordingly, a bill was filed in the circuit court of the United States in the district of South Carolina, against the members of the firm of John Frazer & Co., in the name of the United States, demanding of them an account of all their acts as agents of the Confederate government, and that they be enjoined from conveying away, encumbering, or disposing of any estates acquired since they became agents of the so-called Confederate States, and that such property be decreed to the United States. This bill was filed in May, 1867, and the desired injunction granted by the circuit court. To which bill an answer was afterwards filed by the defendants, as appears by the bill and answer hereto annexed, marked G.

Meanwhile, the house of Fraser, Trenholm & Co., in Liverpool, had become bankrupt, and the managing partner in England, Charles K. Prioleau, who had conducted the defense against the United States, now made a desperate attempt to obtain the dismissal of the bill of the United States there, on the plea of the pendency of the general bill of discovery in the United States. The effect of this, if done, would be to relieve Mr. Prioleau at the expense of his partners in the United States, to deprive the Government of its hold of the property there, and to throw the whole weight of the claims of the Government upon the property of the house of John Fraser, Trenholm & Co., of Charleston.

Hence it became of interest to the copartners in the United States not only to put a stop to controversy and costs, but so far as possible to satisfy the claims of the Government out of the property in England; to effect which negotiations were entered into between them and the counsel on the one hand and the counsel of the United States on the other hand, under the supervision of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury, the result of which was the conclusion of an agreement on the 5th day of September, 1867, which was approved by the President of the United States, and a copy of which is hereto annexed, marked H.

This agreement, conceived in the idea of the United States receiving, and Fraser, Trenholm & Co. paying, precisely that which the United States may lawfully claim in a court of chancery, neither more nor less, is in substance as follows:

1. That in the suit pending in England for the recovery of the cargo of the ship Aline, judgment shall be entered for the United States with costs.

2. That all other specific property of every kind, whether ships or other property, and all moneys belonging to the Confederate States at the time of their dissolution, which at any time after that date came into the possession of Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm & Co., or the proceeds thereof, if sold, shall be delivered up to the United States.

3. That Fraser, Trenholm & Co. shall consent to a decree in the pending suit for an account to be rendered by them, in due form of law on oath, before a master in chancery, as demanded by the United States, and whatever amount of money such accounting shall show to have been due by the defendants to the Confederate States at the time of their dissolution shall be paid to the United States.

4. Fraser, Trenholm & Co. are to deliver up, or account for, all ships or other specific property of the Confederate States, unless the same be subject to express legal or equitable antecedent claims of theirs, valid in law, on contracts made during their agency for the Confederates.

5. That the property of the copartners shall be held by the Government under the injunction of the circuit court in South Carolina, and under the statutory lien as security for the foregoing conditions; and if those conditions be not complied with in a reasonable time, then the Government shall take judgment against the parties or their property in the United States.

This agreement was concluded in the city of Washington, and there is no correspondence on the subject in this Department.

A copy of the agreement hereinbefore spoken of as having been entered into by Mr. Morse is annexed, marked I. The correspondence relating thereto was communicated to the House of Representatives by message of the President, under date of January 28, 1867.

The two agreements are then copied, and the Secretary continues:

Such is the difference between these two agreements. And, in the judgment of this Department, therefore, while the agreement made by Mr. Morse in London was unwise as well as unauthorized, and would have been wholly unproductive of any beneficial result to the Government, that entered into at Washington secures to the United States reasonable expectation of obtaining from Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm & Co. all the money or other property to which the United States are lawfully and justly entitled.

During the period in which the Government was prosecuting in England the suits against Fraser, Trenholm & Co., it was prosecuting various other suits, some of which have terminated successfully, and others of which are still pending in the different courts of Great Britain.

The Government has recovered by suit in admiralty four of the cruisers of the Confederate government, namely, the Sumter, the Tallahassee, the Shenandoah, and the Rappahannock, together with some other miscellaneous parcels of property, amounting in proceeds to $160,476.

In these cases the Government has steadily contended that it has the right in law to take possession of any public property of the Confederates, wherever it may be found, whether at home or in foreign countries; claiming power to do this summarily and as of right, and, of course, in the United States or on the high seas, and demanding of the foreign courts of law in foreign countries that they shall co-operate in enabling the United States to reclaim such property by suit, if brought into the ports of any such foreign government.

To this pretension of the United States there was opposition at the outset, fraudulent sales and pretended liens being set up by agents of the Confederates, especially in England, and in the courts of admiralty as well as of chancery. But all such obstacles were at length overcome, and the sovereign rights of the United States in these respects definitely recognized and established.

Suits are pending in England against sundry parties, among which are the Blakeney Ordnance Company, to recover ordnance contracted for by the Confederates, as also against two of the financial agents of the Confederates, namely: James B. Ferguson and Colin McRae. In these two latter suits an important legal question arose, which has served to delay their prosecution. To the bills of discovery and account against them respectively defendants demurred, alleging that they had been or might be prosecuted in the United States under acts of confiscation and forfeiture, and that, therefore, they ought not to be compelled to make discovery in England, which might be used against them here.

This question was argued in the case of the United States vs. McRae, before Vice-Chancellor Wood, who sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill. But, on appeal, whilst the court of appeals concurred with the vice-chancellor in opinion as to the sufficiency of the demurrer, still it held that the United States were entitled to an account, and, therefore, reversed so much of the decree of the vice-chancellor as dismissed the bill. It was on account of this decision that the idea was conceived in Congress at this session of the enactment of a law touching discoveries in equity, which was passed some weeks since, and the enactment of which will serve greatly to facilitate the prosecution of these suits in England.

The whole question was before Congress, and Congress then passed such a law as was deemed necessary to make all those prosecutions successful. Now, listen to this:

The archives of the so-called Confederate government, now in the possession of the United States, show that many millions were received and disbursed by McRae on Confederate loans in Europe, and the object of the suit is to reach any balance which may have remained in his hands at the time of the extinction of the confederation.

One suit only has been instituted in France, but that is of considerable importance. It is a suit against the wealthy ship-building firm of Arman Fils & Co., to recover a large sum of money placed in their hands to be employed in the construction of a ship or ships of war for the use of the Confederate government. That cause has not yet come to issue. Inquiries continue to be made under the authority of the Department—

Listen to this—

Inquiries continue to be made under the authority of the Department in pursuit of all persons in England holding money or other property of the Confederates; and wherever information has been obtained sufficiently specific to justify the expense of suit, suit has been instituted; and in some instances such property has been obtained without suit, on the voluntary surrender of it by conscientious parties.

Now, mark, this was in 1867.

But exaggeration has existed as to the amount of balances of money or other property now remaining in the hands of agents of the Confederates abroad, other than those against whom suits have already been brought. Proffers of service in this respect are from time to time made, which always receive attention when the parties thus volunteering appear to possess any trustworthy knowledge or means of knowledge. In some cases, however, the proffers of such service are without avail, owing to the information offered being too indefinite or uncertain to afford any guidance to the efforts of the Government. The only person employed by the Government in Europe as its agent in reference to any of these matters has been Mr. H. B. Titus, of the State of New Hampshire. He had been previously employed as an agent of the Department in the Southern States, and was selected for the new service in the ordinary course of business and without special recommendation. No contract was made with him for a share of the property recovered.

Mr. L. B. Brasher, of Tennessee, who had also been employed in the Southern States, having by letter represented to the Department that he possessed valuable information in this respect, was referred to the consul of the United States at London, to act under the direction of the latter, and with the understanding that in case of success he should receive a share of property recovered. This authority was given to Mr. Brasher, also, in the ordinary course of business and without special recommendations. He, however, did not go to Europe, although his brother, B. P. Brasher, went professedly in his stead, but without any authority from the Government. The Department is not informed that he has recovered any property, nor has he received any compensation. Copies of the correspondence on the subject are annexed, marked L.

The compensation of Mr. Titus and that of the counsel for the Government have been drawn from the direct proceeds of property collected in Europe.

And the names of persons employed by Government in this behalf, and the payments made to them, appear in the document hereto annexed, marked K.

The heads of departments of the United States have at all times heretofore been deemed to possess authority to retain counsel or attorneys, when the public service requires it, in the prosecution of suits not within the official duty of the Attorney-General or district attorneys of the United States, and the Treasury Department, in doing that here, has acted in accordance with the established practice of the Government.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, that shows precisely what was done immediately on the collapse of the Confederacy—that the United States Government, through its agents in all foreign countries, instituted the closest investigation, and instituted suits and prosecuted them in France, in England, and in the United States, and wherever a particle of property could be found or traced to which the Confederacy had any right.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator please state what information he has as to what was the result of those suits—what became of them?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no further information than is stated there.

Mr. CALL. Do these documents state what became of those suits?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not all of them. The suits were pending, however.

Mr. CALL. Or of any of them?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, some of them. They recovered four vessels.

Mr. CALL. That was in the Trenholm case.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

Mr. CALL. Does the Senator know of any account anywhere given of the results of the numerous suits referred to in that paper?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I do not. I have not investigated the subject.

Mr. CALL. Did the Senator ever hear anybody say?

Mr. COCKRELL. I never asked for information. The Treasury Department doubtless has it. There is no question about that.

Mr. CALL. Does the Senator from Missouri know that fact?

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, I presume that the Treasury Department at that time had power in regard to the subsequent proceedings, just as it had in regard to the proceedings detailed here.

Mr. CALL. You presume that?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes. I do not know it, as a matter of course. I have not known it, because I have not seen it, but I know to a moral certainty that Mr. Hugh McCulloch or any other Secretary of the Treasury, I do not care who he is, would, as a matter of course, give attention to these questions. It was his duty to do so, and he would have been liable to impeachment if he had not done so.

Mr. CALL. Does the Senator know if these suits are still pending?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know. If they are, however, it is not $10,000 that you want, with which to send out spies or detectives, but an amendment which would enable the Government to proceed against the administrative officers, and institute prosecutions in the name of the United States.

Mr. CALL. Well, the Senator can amend my amendment if he thinks that is the proper thing to do.

Mr. COCKRELL. If there are suits pending it would be necessary for the Senator to provide for suits against the administrative authority who have the matter in charge, and not to undertake to find whether there is any such property or not.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. There is not a word said about "spies" or about sending out anybody to "detect" anything.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, Mr. President, I want to read the basis on which the proposed expenditure of this $10,000 is grounded.

On the 13th instant the Senate passed a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish such evidence as might be in the Treasury Department relating to property of the United States, or to which the United States has a valid claim, which is held in adverse possession against the United States, with such recommendation as to its recovery as he might consider best for the public interest. In response to that the Secretary of the Treasury transmitted this letter to the Senate dated July 26, 1888:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., July 26, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the following resolution adopted in the Senate on the 13th instant:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate such evidence as may be in the Treasury Department relating to property of the United States, or to which the United States has a valid claim, which is held in adverse possession against the United States, with such recommendation as to its recovery as he may consider best for the public interest."

In response thereto I transmit herewith the reports of the Solicitor of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, respectively (inclosures Nos. 1 and 2), containing statements in regard to the property of the United States in charge of these officers.

I also transmit herewith the original reports, with accompanying papers (inclosures numbered 3 to 10, inclusive), of Mr. H. B. Littlepage, lately employed as an agent of the Treasury Department. This agent performed his duties under direction of the Solicitor of the Treasury, and his reports were made to that officer.

These reports and accompanying papers contain all the evidence or information in possession of the Department relative to the property therein referred to. The Department is unable to determine what a further investigation might develop respecting the interest of the United States in this property; but if further investigation is deemed advisable it will be necessary for Congress to make an appropriation therefor.

Respectfully, yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT of the United States Senate.

The exhibits are, first, the report of the Solicitor of the Treasury dated July 17, 1888. The report of the Solicitor of the Treasury, being inclosure No. 1 of the Secretary of the Treasury, does not show any information in regard to this property, and does not refer at all to Confederate property. Exhibit No. 2 is the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and he knows nothing about these matters, gives no information whatever, and only refers to property in the United States.

Now, Mr. President, we come to exhibit No. 3, the letter of H. B. Littlepage to the Solicitor of the Treasury, dated October 19, 1887. Here is Mr. Littlepage's letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 19, 1887.

SIR: Having been notified of my employment "to assist in the prevention and detection of frauds upon the customs revenue," after my several conversations with you, I infer that my special assignment will be to recover such properties belonging to the late Confederate States as have been fraudulently or improperly diverted or concealed.

In order that I may get to work effectively, it will be necessary for me to go to the following places in Virginia: the cities of Richmond and Norfolk, and the counties of Clarke, King William, Washington, and Accomac.

After getting through in Virginia I should like to go to Philadelphia, New York City, Boston, and Halifax, N. S.

My purpose in visiting each of these places is to obtain evidence in regard to the Confederate property of which I have already written you.

I shall make every effort to keep my expenses as low as possible, and to make my services valuable and creditable to the Treasury Department.

Above all, I desire that my "special assignment" shall be kept a profound secret.

I am, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. B. LITTLEPAGE.

Hon. ALEXANDER McCUE,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

Exhibit No. 4 is a letter of the Solicitor of the Treasury to H. B. Littlepage, dated October 20, 1887. It reads as follows:

[Inclosure No. 4.]

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C., October 20, 1887.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 19th instant informing me of your employment by the Secretary of the Treasury to assist in the prevention and detection of frauds upon the customs revenue.

It appears that you have been more especially assigned to recover certain property of the Government which has been fraudulently or improperly diverted or concealed, and that you are required to operate under my directions and report results to me.

You state that in order to obtain necessary evidence and work effectively it will be advisable for you to go to certain places in the State of Virginia, namely, the cities of Richmond and Norfolk, and the counties of Clark, King William, Washington and Accomac; and afterwards to the cities of Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Halifax, Nova Scotia.

You are therefore authorized and directed to proceed, as soon as practicable, to the above-named cities and counties of Virginia, for the purpose of obtaining evidence and making investigations relative to the property referred to in your letter, and to make full reports thereof to me.

The propriety of authorizing you to proceed for like purpose to the other mentioned places, or any of them, will be hereafter determined.

Very respectfully,

A. MCCUE, Solicitor.

H. B. LITTLEPAGE, Esq., Washington, D. C.

Next we come to Exhibit No. 5, which is the report of H. B. Littlepage to the Solicitor of the Treasury, dated November 17, 1887. That report reads as follows:

[Inclosure No. 5.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 17, 1887.

SIR: In compliance with your letter of October 20, authorizing and directing me to proceed to the places in Virginia mentioned in my letter to you of October 19, for the purposes mentioned therein, I went via Baltimore to King William County, Virginia, my home, to examine my old Confederate papers, made and received while in Europe, under the orders of the then Confederate States government, to obtain accurate data.

I found that in the winter of 1864 I was ordered to the Confederate ship of war the Texas, alias the Pampeiro. The Texas was built at Glasgow, a first-class sloop of war, pierced for ten of the heaviest guns then carried and A1 in every respect. Her armament and equipment were put aboard of a brig to be taken aboard the Texas off the coast of England. Capt. Terry Sinclair, of the Confederate States navy, superintended her construction, and, together with Captains North and Bullock, adopted her model and outfit. Her original cost was $1,400,000, and the work upon her was paid for as it progressed. She was to have been commanded by Capt. T. Sinclair, to whom I was ordered to report for duty. William C. Whittle was ordered to her as executive officer, and Lieutenants Marmaduke, Trigg, and Browne, with myself, her watch officers. All of the above-named officers are personally well known to me, and, excepting Captain Sinclair and possibly Captain Whittle, all I have said or may say as to the Texas will be corroborated by written statements from each.

The Texas, or Pampero, as she was then called, started out to sea, but having been reported as a Confederate cruiser, upon a close inspection, her outfit was overhauled, and even her crockery, cutlery, and linen were found marked "C. S. S. Texas." The Texas, alias Pampeiro, was then seized, rather than carry her through the courts, and to probably share the fate of the Alexandria. Sinclair secured her release by guarantying that she should not go into the hands of the Confederates until they should be entitled to have her. He then chartered her, and when a few months afterwards the Confederacy collapsed she was sailing under the same charter policy.

She was fully paid for, and every dollar by the Confederate government. She unquestionably belongs to the United States Government.

The Texas, alias Pampeiro, is still a ship of great value, and only a few years ago she was trading between Edinburgh and Copenhagen. It was within my knowledge that the Texas, alias Pampeiro, belonged to the Confederacy, not only from my private letters from Captain Sinclair speaking of her superior qualities, but my orders were to report to him for duty on board the "Confederate States sloop of war Texas."

Now mark. This is evidence and proof of ownership by the Confederate government from some man who says he was ordered to command this vessel!

I found among my private papers other statements which point to valuable sources, which I have not had time to follow up.

From King William County, I went to Richmond, Va., to ascertain where I could find Captain Trigg, formerly of the Texas.

Learning that he was not at his home in Washington County, but was attending a court in southwest Virginia, I went to Norfolk, Va., to see Captains Whittle and Mayo. I can find Captain Trigg at almost any time, and he will not only sustain all I have said regarding the Texas, but testify as to other valuable Confederate properties in Europe which should come into possession of the United States Government.

They have just been lying there quietly for twenty-three years; they have just been waiting for the United States or somebody else to put hands on the personal property.

Capt. W. C. Whittle assisted Commodore S. Barron, who acted as chief of bureau of orders and detail. Whittle could give much valuable information, but to get it, he should be handled with great caution. He would greatly prefer that his old Confederate friends should be benefited by his silence to informing upon them to the Government; besides, his near connections are directly interested. I hope, nevertheless, to be able to get much valuable matter from him.

Capt. W. R. Mayo, of Norfolk, will furnish a statement in regard to several Clyde-built steamers which were paid for by the Confederate Government, and should now belong to the United States. Many of the Clyde-built steamers, used for blockade running, are still very valuable; most of them were new when the war ended and all were selected for their good qualities. When the Confederacy collapsed these valuable steamers, bought and paid for by the Confederate States, were caught in the hands of their captains or agents and were kept or disposed of by them without authority. They properly belonged to the United States, but as they were not claimed, their captains or agents either kept them or made such disposition of them as they could.

That, Mr. President, is the foundation for recovering blockade runners! There were seven of them that belonged to the Confederate government. Here we have the records of the Confederate government, just as they were made out, showing what belonged to that government. They do not show it. There is no pretense that they show it. Here is a vessel that runs the blockade, and because it runs the blockade of the Confederacy it belongs to the Confederate government!

I also found among my papers full descriptions of the two Confederate rams built on the Mersey under the supervision of Captain Bulloch, and were paid for by the Confederate agent as the work progressed upon them. These two powerful rams, then called the El Tousson and Monnassaire (pretending to be for the Chinese Government), made a trial trip with Confederate officers aboard to inspect and to thoroughly test them. They proved to be entirely satisfactory and each had her complement of Confederate naval officers. Like the Texas, their guns and equipments were to be taken on board at sea, but when starting they were seized by the British authorities, and they were finally disposed of by their Confederate agents, and they are now in the British navy and were recently seen by Admiral Luce at Bermuda.

This is the wonderful discovery of this distinguished naval officer, Admiral Luce. He sees at Bermuda a vessel in the British navy, owned by the British Government and sailing under the British flag, and we are to propose to capture that as having been a Confederate vessel, to take that property as belonging to the Confederacy, when this statement shows that the English Government seized the vessel when she attempted to go to sea.

They were built under the supervision of Confederate naval officers, were paid for by Confederate financial agents.

How does he know that they were paid for by Confederate financial agents? Here we have had suits pending against all these financial agents, yet he knows more than they do! And he can get more information than we could get out of them!

And but for having been fraudulently disposed of, they should now belong to the United States. These two valuable ships, or their value, can be recovered.

Making England, I suppose, pay for the one that she condemned!

In addition to the above report, I beg to file an itemized statement of Confederate properties unrecovered by the United States Government, but which might have been recovered had proper steps been taken. I believe that a large amount of the property described may yet be recovered, although so many years have elapsed.

I am, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. B. LITTLEPAGE.

Hon. ALEXANDER MCCUE,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

Here is a postscript:

P. S.—I have omitted to state, that before leaving Washington I opened an extensive correspondence with the view of ascertaining where I could find the officers or other persons from whom I could obtain information.

Among the replies to my letters I received a letter from Capt. H. H. Marmaduke, of the class of '58 United States Naval Academy, and who was with me in Europe. He is familiar with many of the facts recited, and, in reply to my letter, he stated that he could meet me in Washington at any time not ater than November 12. I returned to Washington in time to meet him and talked over matters fully and freely with him. He stated that he could specifically testify to the fact that he was ordered to one of the Confederate rams now in the British navy—that they were constructed by direction of and under the supervision of Confederate naval officers, and that they were paid for by the Confederate agent—that they belonged to the Confederacy, and that after their trial cruise, when they were fully inspected and tested by the Confederate officers detailed for that purpose, they returned to the Mersey and soon afterwards started to sea as Confederate cruisers; that they were Confederate property when the war ended and that their subsequent appearance in the English navy can not properly be accounted for.

Now in the British navy—

Well, I suppose England could properly account for how she got those vessels, just as well as the United States could account for any of our vessels.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if I may make a sugestion, they can all be accounted for, for they all belonged to the British navy at that time. Every one of the cruisers was built by British money and Confederate cotton, and they were just as much a part of the British forces then as they are now.

Mr. COCKRELL. But the Senator from Florida claims that they belong to the United States now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no; they belong to the British.

Mr. COCKRELL—

Captain Marmaduke will also testify to the fact that after the rams were detained by the English authorities he received orders to report to Capt. Terry Sinclair, Confederate States navy, for duty on board the Confederate States steamer Texas, alias Pampeiro, and that she was a Confederate vessel, paid for by the Confederate government, and that she belonged to the Confederacy when the war ended.

As soon as I can safely obtain them I shall ask to file with this report written statements from each of the above-named officers confirmatory of all I have stated.

Respectfully,

H. B. LITTLEPAGE.

Then comes another letter or report from Mr. Littlepage, dated December 20, 1887:

[Inclosure 5 A.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 20, 1887.

SIR: Inclosed herewith please find statements relating to property which belonged to the Confederate States when they collapsed, and which then should have become the property of the United States.

The gentlemen furnishing the statements, namely, Messrs. Moore, Marmaduke, Trigg, and Browne, all resigned from the United States Navy upon the outbreak of the war, and were sent abroad during the war in connection with Confederate matters there. Their statements corroborate my own as to the rams built on the Mersey by Messrs. Laird & Co. for the Confederates, and also as to the Texas, alias Pampeiro, and as to many of the Clyde-built steamers mentioned by me, besides giving facts in regard to others, and reminding me of the rams built in France for the Confederates, personal information of which I already possessed, but failed to mention in my former report.

This property so clearly belonged to the United States Government when the war ended, that these gentlemen have expressed to me their greatest surprise that none of it has been recovered, and have also stated that they believed that a large amount of it might still be recovered, even after the lapse of so many years. In addition to the inclosed written statements, I have recently obtained important information as to the whereabouts of some of the property mentioned. Two gentlemen, one of whom was an officer on the Alabama and the other an officer on the Shenandoah, told me that they had recently been guests at the house of Captain Sinclair, who had charge of the Confederate steam-ship Texas, alias Pampeiro, and that all the crockery, linen, cutlery, etc., that they saw in his house was marked "C. S. N." One of these gentlemen told me that of his own knowledge Sinclair had sold at public auction since the war a brig-load of arms, equipments, clothing, and supplies, which were provided to fit out the Texas for a long cruise, and that Sinclair was getting the full benefit of the Texas when it was so well known that she was built for and paid for by the Confederate States government.

The Texas, alias Pampeiro, was, from the latest accounts I have been able to get, running under a charter policy, between Edinburgh and Copenhagen. I have also ascertained that The City of Petersburg and Old Dominion, two new Clyde-built steamers belonging to the Confederacy when the war ended, were recently running between Liverpool and Dublin. I have, in addition to the above, recently learned the residence of two paymasters in the Confederate States navy who were abroad during the war, and who will be able to give me much detailed and valuable information as to deposits of Confederate funds abroad, and as to the purchase of ships and other property.

I have recently gotten the names of some of the officers who were ordered to the Confederate rams built by Laird & Co. on the Mersey, and which were recently seen flying the British flag at Bermuda by Admiral S. B. Luce and the officers of the North Atlantic squadron. I shall soon be able to get the names of all the officers ordered to them and the evidence that they were built for the Confederacy under the supervision of Captain Bulloch, Confederate States navy, and that they were paid for by the Confederate Government.

I am, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. B. LITTLEPAGE.

Hon. ALEXANDER MCCUE,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

I believe that there are some gentlemen on this floor who had some knowledge of the Confederate Government, and some who were in the Confederate service; and I shall be very frank in expressing the opinion that they will be astonished when they ascertain the immense wealth of the Confederacy at the time of the collapse.

Mr. BLAIR. Is it necessary, I will ask the Senator, to use that word "Confederacy" so much—"Confederate States?"

Mr. COCKRELL. What would the Senator have—"Rebel States?"

Mr. BLAIR. Anything the Senator pleases, but do not say "Confederate." I do not think it is proper.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire will just tell me any word in the English language that will tickle his ear when applied to the "rebels" or "Confederates" or whatever he cares to call them, I shall be only too happy to use it.

Mr. BLAIR. I only express my feelings in the matter. If the Senator will continue to injure them I can not help it. I only request him not to do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. Well, I have a tender regard for the Senator's feelings.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will permit me, there are other Senators who have tender feelings, and may be as tender about the matter as I am.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg their pardon if there are. I am only reading what my friend from Florida has brought into this discussion.

Mr. CALL. I protest against the Senator saying that I brought the matter into this discussion. I have nothing whatever to do with his reading these papers.

Mr. COCKRELL. These papers were sent to the Senate in response to a resolution of the Senator from Florida, and they are the foundation upon which this amendment is proposed.

Mr. CALL. They belong to the Senate in executive session.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, here is a precise description of the property or proceeds:

[Inclosure 6.]

Property or proceeds now in Europe, Great Britain, and some parts of the American continent, that belonged to the so-called "Confederate States," as follows:

Item No. 1: Consists steamer last secured by bond in Liverpool and New Orleans	$48,600.00
Item No. 2: Specie, cotton, army and navy equipments, and stores in hands of Fraser, Trenholm & Co., and their agents, about	3,700,000.00

The report I have read shows that the United States commenced suit against Fraser, Trenholm & Co. in 1865, sued them in England and sued them in the United States, and prosecuted the suits to a vigorous conclusion.

Mr. CALL. How much did they get?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know. They got all they had, and they made a written agreement with them to surrender to the United States every particle of property they had.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. The Senator is asserting the correctness of that position. I ask him how much, if he knows, the United States actually recovered?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know, but I know that this firm made a written contract with the United States about suits brought against them in which they themselves offered to surrender and deliver every particle of property belonging to the collapsed Confederacy which was in their hands or under their control.

Mr. CALL. In order that we may see how much value can be placed on the Senator's criticism on that paper, I will state to him that the papers he has there show that a very large part of the amount named there was paid by Trenholm, Fraser & Co. to the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then is it still due to the United States? Here is the Senator coming in and contradicting his own statement.

Mr. CALL. When the Senator gets through his long statement I will show that he is fighting a figure of his imagination, a figure in the air. Of course it is not the amount that they settled that is in question.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then it is $100,000 more than they settled?

Mr. CALL. Can not the Senator understand that the paper to which he refers was made out years ago?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; it is a list of property now.

Mr. CALL. It is taken from the records of the Department showing the property which the Government had information might probably or possibly be recovered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me understand it. Then I confess I have been wholly misinformed.

Mr. CALL. Entirely.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then this is not a statement made out by Mr. Littlepage of information that he has as to property belonging to the Confederate government?

Mr. CALL. If the Senator will now put his mind to it, perhaps he will understand it. [Laughter.] It is very plain to me. I understand that years ago investigations commenced and a schedule was made out, by Confederate officers like Mr. Littlepage, who fought gallantly throughout the war and distinguished themselves, but who thought that it was part of their duty to state the truth to the United States—of the property of which they were personally cognizant in one form or another as the property of the Confederate States—not professing to speak with the perfect accuracy of the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," but from the ordinary sources of information.

With that schedule, Mr. Littlepage, knowing as to the items in respect to the foreign disbursements of the Confederate government, takes that paper and presents it as a part of the information which he has inquired into, as to some portions of which, as his report shows, he speaks from personal knowledge, and as to some portions from the testimony of others, and as to some not at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very thankful to the distinguished Senator for that information. This has been published and has been reported here as a statement of the Confederate property, which was furnished by Mr. Littlepage. Instead of that—instead, now, of being a list of Confederate property discovered by him, it is a list taken from the Treasury Department, and which is of record in the Treasury Department, and which they have had a record of for the last twenty years.

Mr. Littlepage says:

In addition to the above report, I beg to file—

What?—

file an itemized statement of the Confederate property unrecovered by the United States Government, but which might have been recovered had proper steps been taken. I believe that a large amount of the property stated might have been recovered, although a very large number of years have elapsed.

Here he says that he files in the Treasury Department a statement which, it seems, was already there.

Mr. CALL. I do not know whether the statement is all there. It is wholly immaterial. I have stated to the Senator that that schedule which he has was prepared by Confederate officers and reported to the Government and that Mr. Littlepage files it. Whether he finds it to have been on the files or not before I do not know. He files it as containing items which by his specific report he has personal knowledge of or is informed of.

Mr. COCKRELL. He goes on and gives other items:

Item No. 3: —— —— had the (a) Hausa, (b) Falcon, and (c) Goelyn, half of which belonged to the Confederacy, $750,000.

Item No. 4: —— —— & Co. hold proceeds and stores amounting to $500,000.

Item No. 5: —— —— must account for cargo of steamer Greyhound, $375,000.

Item No. 6: Heavy ordnance and ammunition (offered to be delivered in August, 1867) in the hands of well-known parties in London, $140,000.

Item No. 7: Proceeds of the steamer Pelican in the hands of London commission merchants, $60,000.

Item No. 8: Proceeds of eight steamers, (a) Ravensbury, (b) City of Richmond, (c) Whisper, (d) Abigail, (e) Florence, (f) Louisa Wallace, (g) Eugenie, (h) Ptarmigan, purchased since the close of the rebellion by responsible parties; original cost, $985,000.

Item No. 9: Confederate Government money in the hands of a well-known Confederate agent in Paris. His own admissions acknowledging the fact can be proved by evidence in our possession, $983,100.

Item No. 10: A London Confederate agent is accountable for proceeds of steamer Edith, $60,000.

Item No. 11: Steamer Lydia, docked at Hull under the control of an English Confederate agent at that place in June 1867; cost, $100,000.

Item No. 12: Italian buff shoes, 125,000 pairs, and 200,000 pairs of blankets; cost, $506,292.50.

Item No. 13: Danish frigate, under the control of London and Copenhagen bankers; cost, $1,400,000.

Item No. 14: Proceeds of steamers (a) Cyclone and (b) Tornado, and other property in the hands of the contractor of the above-named frigate, $500,000.

Item No. 15: Proceeds of the Rappahannock, seized and resold since the rebellion by United States consul at Liverpool, and purchased again with Confederate money, $35,000.

Item No. 16: Proceeds of steamers (a) Palmerston and (b) Alexandria, in the hands of London Confederate agents; cost, $200,000.

Item No. 17: Steamers (a) Rattlesnake and (b) Mary Augusta, under control of London ship-builder; cost, $312,000.

Item No. 18: Steamer Harriet Pinckney, or proceeds consigned to commission merchants in London, and by them secured for $90,000.

Item No. 19: The (a) Old Dominion and (b) City of Petersburgh, consigned to Steam Navigation Company in Liverpool; original cost, $350,000.

Item No. 20: Proceeds of Colonel Lamb in the hands of Fraser, Trenholm & Co.; cost, $200,000.

Item No. 21: Proceeds of steamers (a) Wierbrendra, (b) Wyvern, and (c) Scorpion, in the hands of Fraser, Trenholm & Co.; original cost, $1,900,000.

Item No. 22: Two sets of Enfield rifled machinery to be accounted for by Fraser, Trenholm & Co., $410,000.

Item No. 23: Seven tons of bar-silver that can be traced by our agents, worth $233,333.33.

Item No. 24: Eighty chronometers, spoils of the Florida and Alabama, which can be traced by above agents, estimated at $40,000.

Item No. 25: Rifled cannon machinery, packed and in good order in hands of responsible parties, in London, cost $1,000,000.

Item No. 26: The (a) Ruby, the (b) Rosine, the (c) Penguin, the (d) Owl, the (e) Lark, consigned to Fraser, Trenholm & Co., estimated at $750,000.

Item No. 27: Postage-stamps, a portion of which were recovered in August, 1868, in Canada, can be secured for our Government. The remainder is estimated to be worth, $28,000.

Item No. 28: Cotton shipped to Fraser, Trenholm & Co., or order, "since the rebellion," worth, as estimated by the shippers themselves, $3,000,000.

Item No. 29: Sixteen cases of specie in the hands of a rebel agent at St. George's, Bermuda, which can be shown by a reliable witness in London, value not known.

Item No. 30: Money and Confederate machinery in the hands of a Confederate agent, and can be proved to be worth, by a member of the London bar, $250,000.

Item No. 31: Rebel iron-works in Scotland, which can be recovered by our Government, worth, as reliably stated, $300,000.

Item No. 32: The steamer Peterhoff and the Springbok and cargo can be shown to our Government to have been Confederate; not known.

Item No. 33: The original contract between the Confederate government at Richmond and Erlanger & Co., the banker, at Paris, is where I can control it; not known.

Item No. 34: Money deposited to the credit of the rebel government in Vienna, Brussels, Frankfort-on-the-Main, Amsterdam, Paris, and London, amounting, as can be shown to our Government, to $11,000,000.

The late Postmaster-General of the institution which my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] does not like to have called the Confederacy doubtless did not know of that $11,000,000 belonging to the Confederacy.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not like to have it so called because it might creep into the statutes some time.

Mr. CALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. Does the Senator know whether the late Postmaster-General of the Confederate States or the rebel States, as you may please to call them, in the course of his business would have known anything about transactions relating to government property of this character?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I do not know anything that he would have known about it—not a thing.

Mr. CALL. Then the Senator ought not to say anything about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know what he did know about it.

Mr. CALL. Then you ought to say so.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then come the following items:

IN THE UNITED STATES.

Item No. 1: Consists of iron works and lands, together with flouring mills, machine-shops, foundries, and railroads in Marion and Davis Counties, Texas, cost to the Confederate government as can be shown to ours, $3,000,000.

Item No. 2: Confederate mineral lands and iron works in Northern Alabama, estimated at $1,000,000.

Item No. 3: Two steamers and proceeds of 1,400 bales of cotton, together with other goods in and around Memphis, estimated at $1,000,000.

Item No. 4: Not described, but is alleged by a responsible party in Baltimore to be worth $1,000,000.

Item No. 5: Consists of railroad, railroad-iron, and saw-mills, and warehouses, and merchandise in store—all in the State of Alabama.

Item No. 6: Cotton that belonged to the Confederate government shipped from Brownsville, Galveston, and Matamoras, amounting to many millions of dollars, since the termination of the war, as can be shown by the rebel agents employed and in correspondence with our agents, as can be shown to our Government.

Now I come to the letters giving information, and upon which we are asked to expend money in the prosecution of pretended claims:

[Inclosure No. 7.]

ACCOMAC COURT-HOUSE, VA., November 27, 1887.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your confidential letter, which came to hand a few days ago, I have to say, in regard to Confederate property belonging to that government, I was a naval officer and was ordered abroad in the spring of 1863 and ran the blockade in the steamer Antonica, which belonged to the Confederate government. She took out a cargo principally of cotton.

While in Europe I was ordered to a Confederate ship on the Clyde, then called the Pampeiro. While in Europe it was generally known to the Confederate naval officers, including myself, that two ironclads, rams, were built under the supervision of the Confederate naval officers at Laird's ship-yard, called the El Tousson and Monnassaire, which were at that time the most powerful ships afloat, and said to have cost $1,000,000; afterward detained by the British Government as possible violators of the "foreign-enlistment act." I am also aware that a large ship, iron plated, was built on the Clyde, and was under Confederate management.

I left Liverpool, England, in October, 1864, in the steamer Laurel. She was under the English flag, and was commanded by an Englishman named Ramsey. She belonged to the Confederate government.

I was at sea on the Confederate States ship Shenandoah, six guns. She cos £40,000; was left in Liverpool in November, 1865.

I give you my recollection in this hasty letter. Many facts might be called up if sufficient time were given.

I will say, however, that there were many Clyde-built steamers belonging to the Confederate States government in the same ports that I visited.

Yours, respectfully,

ORRIS A. BROWNE.

Capt. H. B. LITTLEPAGE,
Washington D. C.

The next one is the letter of Captain Marmaduke, which I am very anxious to read.

Mr. CALL. I shall be glad if the Senator in reading Captain Marmaduke's letters would state what he knows in regard to him.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will say that Captain Marmaduke is a gentleman of very high character and standing. He belongs to one of the oldest and best families in Missouri. His father was lieutenant-governor and then governor of Missouri, and his brother was the late Governor John S. Marmaduke, of that State. Captain Marmaduke's letter is as follows:

[Inclosure No. 8.]

PULLMAN'S PALACE CAR COMPANY,
Jacksonville, Fla., December 5, 1887.

MY DEAR PETE: I am in receipt of your confidential letter of recent date, and would have answered you sooner but for a press of urgent business which called me away from Jacksonville.

I am glad to learn that the Government is at last taking steps looking to the recovery of some of the vast amount of property which belonged to the Confederacy at the time of the collapse, scattered about over countries outside of the late Confederate States.

You asked me as to the two "Laird rams" El Tousson and El Mounassin, and any other information that I may have touching naval matters and properties abroad.

It is reaching away back with memory to bring these matters up now, after the lapse of a quarter of a century, but I will cheerfully tell you all that I am able to recall on such short notice.

You will, of course, remember that I, like yourself, was one of some sixty officers sent abroad to man the various ships that our government was building in various European ports.

My first assignment was to the iron-clad ram El Mounassin, then in process of construction at Birkenhead by the Messrs. Laird Brothers. This was, as I remember, in 1863.

This vessel and El Tousson were being built ostensibly for the Khedive of Egypt, but the construction was under contract between Messrs. Laird and Captain Bullock, C. S. N., agent of the Confederate government, who supervised the work.

The work on those vessels so far progressed that El Mounassin was launched, and El Tousson also, I think. I know the Mounassin made a successful trial trip on the Mersey, and on board of her, incognito, were several Confederate officers.

The armament and equipment of these vessels, as understood at the time, was provided by Captain Bullock. A short time after this trial trip was made this vessel and the Tousson were seized by the English Government, and the "broad arrow," representing in technical language the Queen's Own, was printed on the bows of the ships.

These two vessels, according to Captain Marmaduke (and doubtless his memory is correct in regard to that matter), were seized by the British Government, no doubt confiscated, because "the broad arrow, representing in technical language the Queen's Own, was printed on the bows of the ships."

After this I next heard of these two splendid ships as forming part of Her Majesty's "channel fleet"—

Afterwards the next heard of them was forming a "part of Her Majesty's channel fleet"— under changed names which I do not now recall.

In my capacity as an officer assigned to one of these ships I learned that Messrs. Laird & Co. were paid for them as the construction progressed by moneys furnished indirectly by Captain Bullock.

After the retention and seizure of these two rams I received orders to report to Capt. Terry Sinclair for duty on board of a ship called the Texas, alias Pampeiro, building on the river Clyde, at Glasgow, but was directed by Captain Sinclair to repair to the quiet little French city of Amiens, to there maintain an incognito and await further orders. I remember now with some amusement how I passed for some weeks as "Mr. Mathews."

The Texas was completed, her battery and equipment were provided, and plans made to deliver them on board the ship at some point outside of the waters of Great Britain.

I remember also that her linen, crockery-ware, etc., were marked "C. S. N." This vessel was afterward seized by the English Government, and Sinclair was censured for having talked too much and for being otherwise indiscreet in the matter.

At this distant date I am unable to recall who were the officers assigned to this ship, though I think that George Shyrock, since dead, was her executive officer. I know that he and I often, after the war was ended, while we were both living in St. Louis, used to talk those pleasant days over together, and we both wondered what had become of all the ships and other property which we knew to have been in the possession of Confederate agents in Europe. I never knew what became of the Texas.

After the experience of the Texas, I, with a lot of other fellows, was sent back to the Confederacy, and in the course of the war I was on duty on the fleets at Savannah, Charleston, and Wilmington.

From the last two ports, as you know, blockade-running was a nightly pastime when the "moon was right." Some of these "fly-by-night" steamers were owned by the Confederate Government, commanded by Confederate officers, and laden with Government cargoes of cotton, naval stores, etc., bringing on return voyages Government supplies. The question most naturally arises, what become of all this property?

I remember distinctly having been the guest for two or three nights on board of his ship at Charleston, of the captain of the blockade-runner Confederate States, which at the time was loaded with a cargo of Government cotton waiting for the dark (?) moon.

The ship made a successful run to the Bermudas, or Nassau; Charleston following shortly afterwards; she never returned. I regret that I am unable to recall the name of the captain. He was an Englishman and held a lieutenant's commission in our service. This ship and cargo might be easily traced. She flew the Confederate flag.

Finally, my dear fellow, the enterprise that you are engaged upon seems to me to be filled with opportunities. I think you ought to be able to find out what became of some of the money and property which was left over "when we broke," and of which I don't think there has ever been any accounting.

I have written you rather a wordy letter without giving you much information, but it will take time and tact for you to work this thing out, but I believe there are chances in it, and I wish you all success.

Your friend, sincerely,

H. H. MARMADUKE.

There are two other letters here.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator from Missouri yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. COCKRELL. In a moment I shall be through. Here are two other letters, one from Thomas L. Moore, and a copy of a letter from Daniel Trigg, which may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letters will be printed as requested, if there be no objection.

The letters are as follows:

[Inclosure No. 9.]

NEW YORK, December 11, 1887.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your confidential inquiries relating to my experience in Europe during the late war between the States, I have to say that I was a lieutenant in the Confederate States navy. In May, 1864, I was ordered to report to Capt. G. T. Sinclair for duty on board the Confederate States steamer Texas. I knew at the time that this vessel was being fitted for sea in the river Clyde under the fictitious name of Pampeiro. She was afterwards detained by the British Government, and was only released by Captain Sinclair chartering her for two years to run between Edinburgh and Copenhagen.

The following November I was ordered to the Confederate States steamer Rappahannock, Capt. Charles Fauntleroy, then in the harbor of Calais, France. I served aboard the Rappahannock as executive officer until the early spring of 1865, when she was sold, by whom and to whom I can not say.

My orders were then to return home and report to the secretary of the navy in Richmond.

I am, sir, very truly, yours,

THOS. L. MOORE,
225 West Twenty-third Street.

H. P. LITTLEPAGE, Esq.

ABINGDON, VA., December 11, 1887.

MY DEAR PETE: I returned home last night after an absence of several days attending court in another county, and received your letter this a. m., which you may be sure I will consider as strictly confidential. I have long thought that there was a great deal in the matter which you are after, and I have no doubt but the Government has been swindled out of vast sums in property and money, and possibly a great deal of it might be still recovered if the proper steps are set on foot.

I am unable to answer the question which you ask. After the lapse of twenty-five years I find that my recollection of things has considerably dimmed, especially about those which I have had no occasion to recall or remember. But I suppose, if intelligently pursued, that it could be definitely ascertained what ships were built abroad by the Confederate States government, what was paid on them, and how disposed of. I remember after the war going from Calais to a Chilian port being run into at sea by a Peruvian man-of-war, the Union, and near by was her sister ship, the America, both built for the Confederacy somewhere in France. I have an account of the affair in an old journal which I kept, and to which I referred.

Now, this might be a matter worth investigating, as the Confederacy had paid for these ships, and after the war they were legitimately the property of the United States Government.

I wish you could come out here. I think there is much in your scheme. If you can, you had better come out here this week. I can make it a point to be at home and meet you at any time. Come and let us talk the matter over.

Yours truly,

DANIEL TRIGG.

H. B. LITTLEPAGE, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I have simply laid all these matters before the Senate in order that they may understand the exact situation. I do not apprehend that there is a solitary Senator who would not be willing to use any reasonable exertions to secure for the United States any property which can be secured in any way which belonged to the Confederacy; but the question is whether now, after the lapse of twenty-three years and after the United States, immediately upon the close of the war, used the greatest possible diligence and ransacked England, France, and all Europe, America, the the West Indies, and every other place, and brought suits against everybody who was supposed to have been connected with the Confederate government and to have represented it—whether after all that has been done we shall open up this question again and make an appropriation and send men abroad to hunt up and try to trace and identify this and that property as having once belonged to the Confederate government. It is simply an absolute waste of so much money and may complicate the United States Government in troubles from which it may not very easily extricate itself.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to withdraw the motion until we can get a vote on this amendment.

Mr. CALL. That will be impossible, Mr. President. I want to say something upon it.

ALLEGED NAVAL DESERTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of one of the conferees on the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, requires the announcement of another manager on the part of the Senate; and in place of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] the Chair appoints the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHARLOTTE, N. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (S. 907) to provide for the erection of a public building at Charlotte, N. C., returned, at the request of the Senate, with the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RANSOM. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF LABOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives for the return to the House of the concurrent resolution for printing 39,000 copies of the third annual report of the Commissioner of Labor; which was agreed to.

REPORTS ON SCALE-INSECTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a special report on the white scale and other scale-insects affecting the orange and other fruit trees in California be printed, and that 50,000 additional copies be printed, of which 25,000 copies shall be for the use of members of the House in whose districts the orange is grown, 12,500 for the use of Senators in whose States the orange is grown, and 12,500 for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a second edition of the special report of the Department of Agriculture on insects affecting the orange be printed, and that 20,000 additional copies be printed, of which 10,000 shall be for the use of members of the House in whose districts the orange is grown, 5,000 for the use of Senators in whose States the orange is grown, and 5,000 for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

CRUISE OF THE CORWIN IN 1884.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 5,000 copies of the report of Capt. M. A. Healy, United States revenue marine, upon the cruise of the revenue steamer Corwin in the Arctic Ocean in the year 1884, and its accompanying documents and illustrations, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Treasury Department.

CRUISE OF THE CORWIN IN 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed, at the Government Printing Office, 5,000 copies of the report of Capt. M. A. Healy, United States revenue marine, upon the cruise of the revenue steamer Corwin in the Arctic Ocean in the year 1885, and its accompanying documents and illustrations, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Treasury Department.

ROGERS'S PANAMA CANAL REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth at the Government Printing Office, and including illustrations and maps, 3,000 copies of the report of Lieut. Charles C. Rogers, United States Navy, on the Panama Canal; of which number 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the House, 500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 1,500 copies to be distributed by the Secretary of the Navy.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION AND NATIONAL MUSEUM REPORTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed of the report of the Smithsonian Institution and of the National Museum for the years ending June 30, 1886 and 1887, in two octavo volumes for each year, 16,000 extra copies of each, of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,000 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

PRINTING OF TARIFF BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 100,000 copies of a comparative statement embodying the present tariff law (act of March 3, 1883), with proposed amendments of H. R. 9051 (Mills bill) to be prepared by the Committee on Ways and Means, be printed for the use of the House.

RICHMOND AND DANVILLE RAILROAD.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 2774) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia.

I will state that I am authorized by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], who a few days ago objected to the consideration of the bill, to say that he withdraws his opposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CAMERON. I would rather not do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. DANIEL. All right, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 1, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 31, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The House was called to order by the Clerk, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 31, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I am compelled to leave the city for two days on important business, and you will therefore please lay this communication before the House, in order that it may choose a Speaker pro tempore to serve during my absence.

Very respectfully,

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

The CLERK. Clause 7 of Rule I provides that when the Speaker is absent and omits to make an appointment, the House shall proceed to elect a Speaker pro tempore to preside during his absence. The election of a Speaker pro tempore is now in order.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN, a Representative from the State of Tennessee, be and is hereby elected Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MCMILLIN accordingly took the chair as Speaker pro tempore and was greeted with applause.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

Prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to inform the Senate that the House has elected Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN, a Representative from the State of Tennessee, as Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

The resolution was adopted.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. MILLS. I now renew the request I made yesterday that Tuesday, the 7th day of August, be set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Labor, excluding the bill in relation to convict labor. As there seems to be some objection to that bill, I ask that it be excepted from the order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS]?

Mr. SPINOLA. Reserving the right to object, I wish to say to the gentleman from Texas that if the bill in relation to convict labor is to be excluded, I certainly shall object.

Mr. MILLS. It will be impossible to get unanimous consent without excluding that bill from the order.

Mr. SPINOLA. Then, sir, let that part of the business of the House of Representatives stand just where it is. The State of New York has already taken steps toward abolishing convict labor in her prisons, and I am not willing to allow Pennsylvania, or any other State, to manufacture goods and flood the State of New York with them.

Mr. LONG. Regular order.

Mr. MILLS. I want to say to the gentleman that I have made this request at the instance of the labor people themselves; so that I am not chargeable with the impolicy of it, if there be any.

Mr. LONG. I withdraw my demand for the regular order.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I want to emphasize the remarks of my colleague from New York [Mr. SPINOLA]. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I object totally to making any exceptions as to the bills of the Labor Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made, and the regular order is demanded.

GEORGE M. OCHILTREE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 4659) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree, with amendments of the Senate thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PUBLIC PARK, ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 2946) granting the use of certain lands to the city of St. Augustine, Fla., for a public park and other purposes.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Speaker, at my request some time ago when that bill came over from the Senate it was laid on the Speaker's table. It is a bill which proposes to give jurisdiction to the city of St. Augustine over a piece of Government land lying in that city, which is now an eyesore, and the purpose of the bill is simply to give the city police jurisdiction over it, in order that they may make it into a park. The bill takes no money out of the Treasury, and it provides that the Government can at any time resume possession of the land. I ask unanimous consent that it be read.

Mr. BACON. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is the regular order.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RAYNER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PAYSON. I object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PUBLIC BUILDING, MUSKEGON, MICH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 1981) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and other public offices at the city of Muskegon, in the State of Michigan; which was read twice, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

CEMETERY, CENTRAL CITY, COLO.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a bill (S. 3305) setting apart a tract of land to be used as a cemetery for the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of Central City, Colo.; which was read twice, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles; and they were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

A bill (S. 1671) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenofsky; and

A bill (H. R. 7839) for the relief of the legal representatives of William Johnnot, Joseph Torrey, and Thomas Blackwell.

PEREZ DICKINSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a bill of the following title, with the message that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House and asked a conference:

A bill (S. 94) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the Senate having disagreed to the amendments adopted by the House to this bill, I ask that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. STONE of Kentucky, Mr. STOCKDALE, and BROWER as conferees on the part of the House.

ANNIE GIBSON YATES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. HUTTON, and Mr. FINLEY as conferees on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. 7708) to increase the pension of Annie Gibson Yates.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also announced the appointment of Mr. HERBERT, Mr. MCADOO, and Mr. THOMAS of Illinois, as conferees on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. 10556) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday, the 7th of August, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills and reports from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BURROWS. I understood the regular order had been called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is insisted upon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports; but, if there be no objection, the Chair will submit several personal requests.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PATTON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. COWLES, for ten days from and after Thursday next, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. HARE, for ten days, on account of important business.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. PHELAN, for ten days, on account of important business.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. DIBBLE. I call up the privileged question which was pending at the adjournment yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The conference report which was pending as a matter of privilege when the House adjourned last evening is now called up by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE]. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments to the said bill, and agree to the same with the following amendments:

1. In third line, first page, strike out the words "proceedings in accordance with the laws of Nebraska" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or otherwise."

2. In tenth line, first page, after the word "dollars," insert "and the cost of said site shall not exceed the sum of $400,000."

And that the Senate agree to the same.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
JOHN McSHANE,
ROBT. P. KENNEDY,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN C. SPOONER,
W. B. ALLISON,
G. G. VEST,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement of the House conferees, submitted under the rule, was read:

The managers on the part of the House on the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Omaha, Nebr., respectfully submit the following statement:

The Senate in the bill provided for $1,200,000 as the limit of cost for site and building. The House amended by substituting provision for a site only, not to exceed in cost $400,000. The effect of the conference report is to provide for a limit of $1,200,000 for site and building complete, and also that of this sum not more than $400,000 shall be expended for the site.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
JOHN McSHANE,
ROBT. P. KENNEDY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move the adoption of this report.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the conference report in this case. It is quite possible that the House may agree to it; yet I desire that this shall not be done without an exact understanding on the part of the House of the situation in which, by the report, we are placed.

The Senate passed a bill for the erection of a public building at Omaha, the limit of cost, including the site, being $1,200,000. That bill when it came to the House was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, by which committee a report was made, not adopting the Senate bill, but recommending that the bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and providing that $500,000 be appropriated for the site and that the question of the erection of the building be remitted to the future.

In the House the bill was amended by providing that the amount appropriated for the site should be $400,000, in which condition it went over to the Senate. The Senate disagreed to the House amendment, and a conference between the two Houses was asked. The House granted the conference, and now we have the result of that conference in the report which is before us. The report is that the House recede from its amendment to the Senate bill and agree to the same, whereby, Mr. Speaker, the bill that this House passed, carrying $400,000, is now before us carrying $1,200,000, the conferees on the part of the House and Senate having agreed upon that sum. I am not, sir, questioning the right of the conference committee to agree to that; but I desire to arrest the attention of the House so that they may see and understand the evils resulting from legislation through conference committees.

Mr. Speaker, the conferees appointed by the House of Representatives are supposed to represent the sentiment of the House. They are charged with the duty of enforcing, as far as in them lies, the views of the House. I do not mean to be understood to say that they have not the right to compromise and accept concessions and yield them, but I mean, sir, that there should be an effort, an earnest effort, on the part of the House conferees to carry out the wishes of the House.

I ask you, sir, what has been the practice of the conference committees of this House in the past, and notably with reference to bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds? Until this morning I had never seen this conference report. It was put in just before adjournment last evening without being read, and is brought before us now for consideration.

Mr. DIBBLE. Was it not printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CRISP. I was about to say, sir, that until this morning—I believe I did say so—I had not seen the report, nor did I know what the report was; but this morning as I was looking over the RECORD, as I daily try to do, I saw this report, and it appeared to me most extraordinary that without one word of explanation, without any allegation that the conferees on the part of the House had made the slightest effort to enforce the views of the House, this report should be brought in recommending that the House recede from its position and agree to the original Senate bill.

The conferees on the part of the House are members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. They are the same gentlemen who reported to the House a bill for this same purpose, not carrying $1,200,000, but one providing an expenditure of $500,000. I ask you, then, sir, had we not the right to expect of the conferees to endeavor at least in the conference to support and maintain the views of the House. If they have done so in the present instance I am as yet not informed of the fact.

As I said before, for I only intend to occupy a few moments of the time of the House, until this morning I had never seen the report. But when I saw it I concluded to try and look a little into the history of conference reports with reference to public buildings this session. I have been unable to examine the entire record, but in every single case that I have examined, every one without exception, the conferees on the part of the House have agreed to the larger sums fixed by the Senate. So far as my investigation goes there is not a solitary exception. I have only had time to look into a few cases. At Wichita, Kans., the House enlarged the limit of the appropriation $30,000. The Senate enlarged it a hundred thousand dollars; it went into conference and the House conferees gracefully yielded to the wishes of the Senate. In the case of the Bridgeport (Conn.) building the House fixed the limit at $100,000; the Senate fixed the limit at $150,000. It went into conference and the House conferees gracefully yielded to the wishes of the Senate in that regard.

Mr. SOWDEN. Was there not a report in that case from the House committee recommending $150,000? And the bill appropriating that amount was agreed upon in the Senate.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman asks me if the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds did not report a bill for $150,000. I accept his statement, but the House of Representatives, which at least has revisory power over the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, passed the bill for $100,000. At Bay City, Mich., the House passed a bill appropriating $150,000. The Senate appropriated $200,000. It went into conference and the House conferees again gracefully yielded to the larger sum fixed by the Senate in that case.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the only cases that I have been able to find.

Mr. SOWDEN. What did the House do in the case of Indianapolis?

Mr. CRISP. That is not pertinent at all to the question I am discussing.

Mr. SOWDEN. It is exactly pertinent, because there the Senate increased the appropriation, and the House, without reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, on motion of the gentleman from Indiana, adopted the bill of the Senate making the increase.

Mr. CRISP. The House, Mr. Speaker, can adopt any bill that it chooses. It can appropriate as much as it pleases for such purposes. That is the action of the House and not of the committee. But that is not the point. My point is that when the House fixes a sum and there is a disagreement between the two Houses and a conference is agreed upon, the conduct of such conference is committed to three gentlemen appointed by the Speaker to represent the honor and dignity of the House. They do not represent themselves alone, they do not represent alone the committee reporting the bill; they represent the entire House. It is their bounden duty to carry out as far as practicable the expressed wish of the House; and yet, during this Congress, in every case, as I have shown, House conferees appointed on disagreeing votes of the two Houses on public building bills have receded from the position taken by the House and agreed to that of the Senate, which has always been for larger appropriations.

Now see how this operates. I want to call the attention of the House to this great evil, for so I regard it.

Some gentleman rises and asks unanimous consent to consider a public-building bill. Some other gentleman—say the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]—objects and says, "there is too much carried in that bill; if you will accept an amendment reducing it $50,000 I will withdraw my objection and permit its consideration." The gentleman interested in the bill says, "I am willing to accept the amendment." It passes here for $50,000 less than reported to the House, and the members of the House console themselves with the reflection that they have saved something, that they have cut down the bill, and that, in that case at least, there will be no extravagance. The bill goes to the Senate. The Senate disagrees to the amendment put on the bill by the House and ask a conference. The conferees are appointed by the Speaker of the House, and we all know how these appointments are made. They meet with the Senate conferees and discuss the matter, and invariably, as far as my researches have gone, they consent to the increase proposed by the Senate, and it is brought back here as a privileged report and has the right of way.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The inquiry I wish to make is this: Do you state to the House, or are you prepared to say that the action of the committee was not proper and that public justice was not done?

Mr. CRISP. I know of no higher tribunal to determine what is right and what is public justice on a question of this sort than the House, of which the gentleman and myself are members. Where that House, by a vote, determine that a certain sum is the amount that ought to be appropriated, my point is that the agents of the House, the conferees, when they meet in conference, ought at least to make a semblance of insisting upon the wishes of the House as expressed by the votes of its members.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Are you prepared to charge in the House this morning that those conferees have abandoned their duty?

Mr. CRISP. I am making an argument to direct the attention of the House to an evil practice. The gentleman can not put me in the position of arraigning individuals. The rules of the House provide that there shall accompany every conference report an explanation thereof. That explanation is not only intended to inform the House exactly what changes have been made in the bill as it passed the House, but I think it should give some reason why the conferees have receded from the position of the House, if they have so receded. This is a good-humored discussion. There is no question of fault-finding about it.

Now, take this Omaha bill. The conferees were my friend from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE], the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; my friend from Nebraska—from Omaha—[Mr. MCSHANE], and some other gentleman, who I do not now recollect. These gentlemen are intrusted with the conference on the part of the House. Now, with the utmost respect for my friend from Nebraska—and he is my friend—I ask the House to imagine how earnestly he would wrestle with the Senate conferees to prevent the spending of $1,200,000 for the erection of an ornamental building in the city of Omaha. Just fancy that picture. [Laughter.]

It is very likely, indeed highly probable, that if I had been just exactly situated as he was I should not have very earnestly resisted myself. This argument is not made with the view of criticising the gentleman from Nebraska, but with the view of criticising an evil practice. Now, if there are any cases where the Senate conferees have receded and agreed to accept the smaller amount fixed by the House, gentlemen on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds can easily refer to them. I do not say that there are no such cases; I mean to say that I have not heard of them. I mean to say that I have called your attention to every single case that I have found, and in every one of them the House has accepted the Senate amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the merits of this bill, but I do say that it strikes me as an extraordinary proposition that in a city the size of Omaha $1,200,000 should be expended for a public building. It is a significant fact that the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in their report on the Senate bill did not advise this House to pass a bill carrying $1,200,000.

That proposition appears here now for the first time indorsed by any member of this House. Gentlemen know how these conference reports are made. They are often brought in, as this was, just as the House is about to adjourn; they are not carefully considered by members, but are generally agreed to at once, and in that way the judgment of the House as expressed by a deliberate vote is very often thwarted, and we do what we would not do if the matter was carefully considered.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said about all that I desire to say upon this question. As I have already remarked, I may not be able to defeat this report. The mover of it, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCSHANE], is, as I have said, my personal friend; and it is exceedingly unpleasant to throw any obstacle in the way of the bill of a gentlemen who occupies that relation to you. And yet, sir, this is so glaring a case of the absolute defeat of the will of the House through this method of conference that, having had my attention called to it, I felt that I would not be justified in remaining silent and allowing it to be adopted by the House without entering my protest.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I see in the RECORD that an amendment has been offered in the Senate to put on the sundry civil appropriation bill all the appropriations that have been passed by the Senate at this session for the erection of public buildings in the whole country, aggregating, as I am informed, somewhere between nine and ten million dollars, probably nearer the latter than the former sum. That amendment, as I understand, is now pending in the Senate, so that we shall probably be confronted in a few days with the question whether this Congress can afford to put on the sundry civil bill, at one session, appropriations for the erection of public buildings amounting to nearly ten millions of dollars. I merely desired before the gentleman took his seat to have this point before the House, as it relates to the whole subject of public buildings. I know nothing of the merits of this particular case except what has appeared here.

Mr. CRISP. I am very glad the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has called attention to that fact. I did not expect, though I see no impropriety in it, to discuss the general question of the legislation generally, that has been had or that is to be had by this Congress on the subject of public buildings. I may, however, say that in my opinion the present system of considering these measures is altogether wrong. There seems to be an idea that, there being a large amount of money in the public Treasury, all kinds of schemes should be devised to take it out. You find bills introduced at this session of Congress providing for the erection of public buildings in towns so insignificant that you are unable to discover any reason to prompt a hope of success even in the mind of the introducer of the bill, except the fact that such measures are not very carefully considered, and the further fact that there is a large surplus which may be reduced somewhat in this way.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. How would my friend change the system? Would he have all the public-building bills put into one omnibus bill, like the river and harbor bill, so that they might come up in a combination and each one help the others, rather than come up as they do now, separately on their individual merits? Does the gentleman think that would be an improvement? I ask simply for information, because the gentleman is a wise man.

Mr. CRISP. The suggestion of my very good friend from Maine that each of these public-building bills now stands upon its own merits is somewhat amusing in the light of what we all know of the methods by which they are pushed through the House. My friend from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN], I believe, is a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. My friend from Maine, I believe, had a public-building bill of his own. How many of the gentlemen on that committee have had public-building bills I do not know, but I can call to mind some half a dozen.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I had a little one, but it was stopped at the White House. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. Exactly. And that "little one" illustrates the point I have made. My friend from Maine could hardly rise seriously in this House—he might try to look serious, but he could hardly feel so inside—my friend, I say, could hardly get up here and seriously insist that the little town for which he procured the passage of that public-building bill is of such magnitude or importance that the public business there requires a building.

Mr. MILLIKEN. In reply to that, I will say to the gentleman that that town comes entirely within the limits of the bill which was presented the other day in the House by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and was discussed here. The bill which I presented here passed the House, and was vetoed by the President under false information.

In his veto message he states that the local postmaster informed him that a suitable lot at Bar Harbor would cost from $25,000 to $30,000, which was more than the bill appropriated for lot and building. A lot, however, entirely suitable could have been procured for $12,000, though it is true the owners reduced the price to secure a post-office for the town; but if the bill presented the other day by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] had passed, this very town would have got a public building under that bill. Therefore, the gentleman will see that I could not have been so amused "inside" as he supposed. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in view of the gentleman's well-known zeal on behalf of his constituents, and in view of his magnified idea of the importance of Bar Harbor, I withdraw and take back what I said about his inside. [Laughter.]

But still his statement that each of these bills stands on its own merits is somewhat amusing. Why, sir, could they be more closely linked together if they were all in one bill, as the river and harbor appropriations of the country are?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I think they could.

Mr. CRISP. Observe a vote taken in this House on a public building bill; find out the members who have bills pending for the erection of public buildings in their district and see whether each does not vote for every other's bill. I admit that after a member has secured the passage of his own bill he may have a spasmodic attack of economy and vote against the bill of everybody else; but that is not the rule.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is not this the rule, that after a member gets his bill through he has "important business" at home, and gets leave of absence? [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. Possibly that may be so. But the fact remains, whatever the reason, that no matter how much want of merit in any proposition may appear to us who have no public-building bills pending, there seems to be carried to the mind of every member who has such a bill pending an absolute conviction that the bill to be voted on is an exceedingly meritorious measure.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman will allow me to say that if these public-building measures were bound together as are the river and harbor appropriations no man would get his bill through first, and then skulk off home. Every man would be interested until all the different measures had been passed.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, that is a question for gentlemen having bills to settle amongst themselves. If they can make the combination stronger, if they can prevent certain gentlemen after they have secured their part of the spoils from departing and leaving other gentlemen to look out for their measures as best they may, that is a matter for them. But for myself I do not propose to aid them. I would like every one of these measures to stand on its merits.

Now, coming back to this particular bill, a friend has called my attention to the fact that there is now in Omaha a public building, erected in 1872, at a cost, if these figures are right, of $352,000. According to this report—and I take it for granted, as the report is made by my friend from that city [Mr. MCSHANE], it presents the advantages and charms of Omaha in a rose-colored hue—according to this report the population of that city is 112,000. It has a court; it has a post-office; it has internal-revenue offices; it has all those things that prosperous and enterprising cities of that size and character have. But it has also what a great many cities of that sort have not—it has already a public building which cost $352,000.

Mr. HOOKER. Built by the Government?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman state when that building was erected?

Mr. CRISP. I will hand the statement to my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] to ascertain that fact, as the paper has just come into my hands. This proposition is to give $1,200,000 more to Omaha for a public building; and I confess that unless some better reason than any with which I am now acquainted shall be presented I for one shall feel constrained to vote against it.

I reserve whatever time I may have.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has seen fit to deliver to the House conferees a lecture for alleged delinquency of duty on their part. I shall not follow the gentleman in his wandering remarks on the subject of public buildings in general. As to the necessity of a public building at Omaha, that question has already been decided by this House—by that majority in whose dignity and authority the gentleman places such implicit confidence and which is to him the source of ultimate decision. When the House of Representatives decided that in its judgment a lot should be purchased in the city of Omaha for $400,000, it then decided in effect that the lot was to be used for the erection of a public building, and it reserved the right to say in the future what limit should be put on the cost of the erection of that building. It is not pertinent to this question to discuss the needs of Omaha.

They have been discussed, they have been sifted, and upon them the decision of the House has been made. This question has nothing to do with the proposition presented by the gentleman from Kentucky as to the action of the Senate on another bill now being considered by the Senate in relation to certain appropriations for public buildings. That has nothing to do with the present proposition, has no relation to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and is simply calculated to divert the minds of the House from the true issue now presented.

Mr. Speaker, I have a word to say in relation to the committee of conference, of which I have been a member. In the first place, this bill received from the full Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds very careful consideration. It came to us as a proposition from the Senate, a body which has as much to say about these matters as we have, which has a right to submit propositions for public buildings. It came to us as a proposition from that body to appropriate $1,200,000 for this public building. We gave to that proposition the consideration which it required.

We found that Omaha was a city of 112,000 people, that in the last sixteen years its population had increased seven times, that it was a growing and progressive city, and that the demands of the public business were not met by the present accommodations. It was the judgment of our committee, Mr. Speaker, that it would be wise in the first instance to secure a proper site for a public building, and that site having been purchased, that at the next session of Congress, when the title was secured, to take up the matter of the building. That was the judgment of the committee, and we went to work to inquire what a site that was suitable would cost the Government. The result of this investigation satisfied the committee, and they so reported, that the site would probably cost in the neighborhood of $500,000, and we placed that limit upon the purchase of a site.

And now we come to the part on which the gentleman from Georgia lays so much stress.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman from South Carolina permit me a moment, to ask at what time the appropriation was made of $360,000 for the construction of a public building at Omaha, and how that sum was expended?

Mr. DIBBLE. It was made and the money was expended about the year 1870, I think.

Mr. HOOKER. Expended in what way?

Mr. DIBBLE. In putting up a public building which suited the demands of a city——

Mr. DORSEY. Of less than 30,000 people.

Mr. DIBBLE (continuing). Which had about 15,000 population. Whether it was properly expended or not, I do not know; but the building was put up for a city of 15,000 people, whereas the present population is 112,000, and manifestly a building adapted to a city of 15,000 does not accommodate a city of 112,000. But, as I said before, on that question the House has passed its judgment and decided to purchase the site and put up a larger building

Now, what was the proceeding in this House? I do not care, Mr. Speaker, to hit back with animadversions or intimate that the gentlemen who oppose these public buildings are either those who have no prospects of public buildings in their own districts or have already been supplied. That has nothing to do with the question. It is a question for the House to decide purely as a business proposition, and I for one, whatever may be the disposition of the gentleman from Georgia, am willing to accept as a presumption in the first instance that the members of the House come here to do their duty both to their own constituents and to the country at large honestly and without such motives as would deserve animadversion.

Let us return to the question as to what was done in this House. This bill was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The members here will remember—for it was sufficiently intensified by repetition on every bill—that a small minority by filibustering attempted to deprive the House of an opportunity of presenting these measures.

The action of the House in relation to this bill in cutting down the amount was in this instance, as in others, controlled by a minority of the House. The proposition was presented to the House through the decided majority of the House, a majority which can not be gainsaid, because the votes will show it, and the minority of the House said, "We will resort to dilatory tactics, we will filibuster unless you submit to deductions." Under these circumstances the House passed the bill for $400,000, after a deduction of $100,000 had been forced upon the majority of the House by the minority.

Now, I am going down to the bottom facts of the case. There is the technical action of the House for $400,000; there is the real fact that this House would have sustained the judgment of the committee had it not been for a minority that were resorting to dilatory tactics to command their own views on these subjects.

The bill went back to the Senate with this proposition; it amounted to this: We said in our reply to the Senate, you propose to erect a public building there at a cost of $1,200,000 for the site and building. We propose to concede that we shall expend $400,000 for the purpose of procuring a site, and will reserve the price to be paid for the building for future action. That is the proposition that went back from the House. The gentleman from Georgia has attempted to present to this House in his usual eloquent and plausible way that the House was not willing to appropriate for Omaha more than $400,000, while the Senate was willing to give $1,200,000, and that we yielded $800,000 to the Senate in the conference.

That was not the proposition at all. The question of the amount was left indefinite by the House; but the House did say that for the site alone without the building, we are willing to give one-third of that amount, but leave for the future the question whether the building shall be erected for $800,000, the balance of the $1,200,000, or for $600,000, which would be less, or for a million of dollars, which would be more. That was what we left for future determination. We just said to the Senate: We will decide on the price of the site and postpone the consideration as to the price of the building; but we did not say that we would not give $1,200,000 for the site and building. So that it is not a just statement of the question to say that there is a difference between the proposition of the House and that of the Senate, acceded to by the House conferees, of $800,000. There was no such difference. The difference is only with reference to the mode of proceeding, and yet that amount is flung out before the House in the eloquent manner of the gentleman from Georgia as if it were the real issue between the two bodies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I was of the opinion, and am of the opinion still, that it would have been wise for the Government to have bought the site and reserved this question for the future, yet I can not look at this proposition to appropriate $400,000 for the site of this building, except as one committing the House to legislate to expend $1,000,000 or more for the site and building together. What does the House buy the site for? Why, it is to put a building on it. What does the House spend $400,000 for; to erect a hundred thousand dollar building? Why, for site and building for the place when it had 15,000 people the House spent $360,000, and for the building alone $350,000.

In view of these facts, is it to be supposed that the House was going to buy the site and put up a one or two hundred thousand dollar building? That would satisfy the economy of the gentleman from Georgia, perhaps, but there is no business and no economy in it. It may "serve to point a moral or adorn a tale" to some constituency where they have no necessity for buildings of a public character, and are not informed as to the requirements in large cities with an increasing population, but there is no substantial economy in the proposition.

Now, what have we in the city of Omaha? Why, we have there a private corporation erecting a building to-day—the New York Life Insurance Company—at a cost of $1,000,000. Another edifice is being built by a single individual at a cost of $750,000. Those are private buildings being built in that city to-day. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is the most economical for the Government, when it has to build a a public building in a large and growing city, to face the matter as a private individual would face it. What do we need in the way of accommodation? what will it cost to give that accommodation? and then appropriate the sum, putting limits around it to protect the administration of the fund within those limits by the executive branches of this Government, and require them to construct a building according to the amount of money the House appropriates.

When that system is adopted, fairly and properly, then we will not have them coming back here and asking an increase of the limit from Congress. The fund will be expended with more economy where safeguards are placed upon the expenditure of these funds, and in order to place proper safeguards over the appropriation, in the first instance, it must be sufficient for the purpose for which it is designed. Now, this was the situation, as I have stated, between the two Houses. The question was not a question of amounts, it was a question of policy, whether to appropriate now for the site and building both, or for the site alone. We went as managers on the part of the House, charged with the proposition of the House in this regard. Now, I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to go into the details of what occurred in the conference committee.

It is neither parliamentary nor appropriate to do so; but this I can say in answer to the attack made upon this conference committee, that the conferees met on three several occasions in relation to the Omaha bill. The occasions were at considerable intervals, and while I do not know how long, it has been several months since this matter has been in conference. The conferees met and could not agree. They met again, and could not agree, and it was only after three conferences that the conferees agreed upon a report which substantially is a compromise between the two Houses. The proposition of the Senate was: for site and building, $1,200,000, without any limit as to the cost of the ground.

Our best advices were that the ground would probably cost $500,000. The question, then, before the conference committee resolved itself into this compromise, that we concede to them what they had in the original bill, so far as passing upon an appropriation for the building, as well as the site. But we put in the bill the proposition of the House as it passed the House, that the site should not exceed in cost $400,000. That proposition was an original proposition of the House. It was not in the Senate bill. The Senate left the cost of site unlimited. That put the limit which the House had placed on this matter, and we put it, while in our judgment the site was not likely to be obtained for anything less than the $500,000, with the probability that in the acquisition of the site the citizens of the place would have to contribute money in order to make up the deficiency.

Now as to the question whether the committee of conference on the part of the House has been derelict in its duty as the servants of the House and has been reckless in its assault upon the public Treasury. We have submitted a business proposition. We have by the result of this conference restrained and limited the Senate proposition in the essential particular. Suppose that the Senate proposition had been adopted without the House proviso, which we inserted in the conference, there would have been $1,200,000 appropriated.

There would have been at least $500,000 of that expended for the site, leaving $700,000 only for the building. Then there would probably be a demand hereafter for an additional appropriation of perhaps one or two hundred thousand dollars more by reason of the insufficiency of the amount. We introduced that element of restriction in the Senate bill. Therefore it was not a surrender on the part of the House or of its conferees to the demands of the Senate. It was a mutual concessiom, the Senate on their part conceding the limit for the price of the site fixed by the House, and the House conceding the present provision for the erection of the building as well as for the purchase of the site. I consider it a compromise.

The gentleman has been pleased to say that he has never known of a conference committee to yield anything on the first conference. Is that what conference committees are appointed for? Are we simply to go through the motions first?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman misapprehended me. I did not say on the first conference. I said that no case had come to my attention where the House conferees had failed sooner or later to surrender to the Senate.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am glad that the gentleman did not take the position which I understood him to take.

Then for the purpose of this argument the gentleman admits that we were put on that committee of conference to give and take, that we were put there to make a compromise; and when the House consents to a conference the purpose is to adjust differences between the two Houses. Now, Mr. Speaker, as long as I have the honor to be a member of this House I shall never knowingly surrrender any of its dignity; I shall never admit that the body at the other end of the Capitol is superior to this, or has any right to dictate to this House as to its action. But, Mr. Speaker, I shall always concede to the co-ordinate branch of the legislature its equal dignity and its equal right with the House to insist. We met to adjust the difference between the two Houses, and, as I have shown the House, we did adjust that difference.

We inserted into the Senate proposition the substance of the House proposition. We got what the House said they wanted, and we yielded to the Senate as to the matter that would in any case have to come up hereafter, the appropriation which would have been the inevitable result in the future if the House bill alone had passed. Mr. Speaker, suppose the Senate had yielded everything, and the House bill had passed appropriating $400,000 for a site, the site would have been purchased, but would that have been the end of it? Would $400,000 have been the entire expenditure?

The next question would have been, what sort of a building should be put up? and that would be a question for future legislation. The purchase of a site costing $400,000 would have involved an expenditure for a building of an amount in the neighborhood of $800,000. I have here the report of the Supervising Architect, which contains all the buildings that has been erected for the large cities in this country, and it shows that the modern buildings in cities as large as Omaha have invariably cost as much as $800,000.

Therefore the only thing we yielded to the Senate was that we agreed to make this expenditure a single, complete proposition instead of making two of it. For my part I thought it was enough to buy the site at this time, but I did not think there was anything so vital in that point that it should not under any circumstances be yielded. In fact, upon the floor of the House when the Omaha bill was under discussion a gentleman who is in the habit of voting in accordance with the views expressed by the gentleman from Georgia, and who was associated with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] at that time in opposition to the bill, criticised severely the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds because they had not submitted the whole expenditure as a single proposition.

That criticism was made by the very gentlemen who were associated in their views with the gentleman who has now criticised the action of the committee of conference. In the debate at that time I stated for the committee that that was not a vital question, that either mode might be adopted, that it seemed good to the committee to propose at that time only an appropriation for the site, but that provision for the building must be made later. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the House is fully advised as to this whole matter. So far as the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are concerned they propose to obey the will of the House. They are in the hands of the House expressing its will by its majority, and I therefore ask the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CRISP. I ask the gentleman to withhold that demand for a few minutes.

Mr. DIBBLE. I think, Mr. Speaker, I must insist on the previous question.

Mr. CRISP. Then I ask the House to vote it down, in order that I may have at least five minutes to reply to the gentleman.

Mr. DIBBLE. If the gentleman needs five minutes for a reply, I will yield it to him out of my time. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has twenty-eight minutes left.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I would like to put to the gentleman from South Carolina a question from a business point of view.

Mr. DIBBLE. I have yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina plants himself before the House squarely upon the proposition that this report is a "compromise" between the House and the Senate. How he arrived at that conclusion, Mr. Speaker, you and the members of this House have heard. The Senate passed a bill providing for an appropriation of $1,200,000 to buy a site and erect a building in the city of Omaha. The House passed a bill providing that $400,000 should be appropriated to buy the site, and that the building should not be erected, because nothing was said in that regard. The committee of conference held their meetings; they met three times, as the gentleman has stated, and struggled to induce the Senate conferees to recede—you know they must have struggled with my friend from Nebraska [Mr. MCSHANE], a member of that committee. They had three meetings, and then they "compromised"—that is, the Senate agreed that $400,000 of the $1,200,000 should go for the purchase of a site, and the remainder for the building. The gentleman says that if they had not done this they might have been compelled to spend $500,000 for the land, and then they would have had only "only" $700,000 for the building.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it seems that some gentlemen have so much familiarity with large amounts of money that when they refer to $700,000 they say "only $700,000," as if that were a mere bagatelle. Eight hundred thousand dollars is the amount proposed to be expended for a public building in a city of 112,000 population, according to the figures of its friends; a city with an existing public building, a handsome marble structure which cost $352,000, a building of such a character that, as has been remarked pending this debate by a gentleman who recently visited that city, he was struck with the fact that the building in size and importance was out of proportion to the town; he thought it was beyond the necessities of the place.

The fact of the existence of a public building is absolutely ignored. The friends of this measure do not say what they propose to do with it, but they propose to appropriate $1,200,000 to erect another building. The House, as I think, improvidently passed a bill providing for the expenditure of $400,000 for the purchase of a site. The conferees bring in a bill carrying $1,200,000, but providing that $400,000 shall be used for purchase of site, and the gentleman from South Carolina tells us that they "compromised with the Senate!" If you can make that sort of a "compromise," Mr. Speaker, in all your controversies, you will be exceedingly fortunate. It is what they call a "jug-handle" compromise, all on one side.

Mr. KERR. I wish to inquire whether the proposition to construct this building has ever been considered by a committee of this House?

Mr. CRISP. Why, sir, the very report submitted by the gentleman from Nebraska says:

> The Senate bill as amended authorizes the expenditure of $500,000 for the purchase of a site in the city of Omaha whereon in the future is to be erected a public building.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It could not be erected in the past.

Mr. CRISP. But the House bill did not contemplate an appropriation for the erection of a building. The Senate bill did. The committee of conference, according to the gentleman from South Carolina, "compromised" by agreeing to the Senate bill——

Mr. DIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRISP. With pleasure.

Mr. DIBBLE. Is the gentleman aware that the House bill used this language:

> To purchase a site to be used for the construction thereon of a building suitable for the accommodation of the post-office, the courts of the United States, and other Government offices in said building?,

Now, I ask whether that does not indicate that Congress proposed not only to purchase a site but to put a building on it afterward?

Mr. CRISP. My proposition is that the House bill was improvidently passed. How many gentlemen in this House when they voted for the bill knew that there was already at Omaha a $352,000 marble building, in which all the business of the Government at that point was transacted?

I think this report should be voted down. There is no evidence—absolutely none—that the present building is insufficient; yet we are asked to hasten into the expenditure of $1,200,000 when there seems to be no public necessity for it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DIBBLE. I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCSHANE] is absent to-day on account of sickness, and on that consideration I will yield five minutes to his colleague [Mr. DORSEY].

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Speaker, the city of Omaha is not within the district that I have the honor to represent in this House, but I am well acquainted with the city and conversant with its needs as though it was a part of my own district.

Let us view this question as a plain business proposition, and in that light let us examine the question, "Is this building needed for the wants of the Government in that city?" It is true, sir, that there is a public building there, a building as I am now informed which cost originally $352,000, although I am satisfied that a building of the same character could be erected to-day for $150,000. It is entirely too small for the business of the Government conducted within it, and it is becoming more and more apparent every day as that city rapidly grows how utterly inadequate the building is.

In the first place, we have a post-office there at which one hundred and eighty mails per day are received and distributed. Within this building is the office of the collector of internal revenue for the district embracing Nebraska and Dakota, in which over two and a half millions of revenue are collected yearly. Then the judges of the United States district and circuit courts have their offices and chambers there, and the United States marshals and United States district attorney have offices in the building, and if, Mr. Speaker, you could see, as I have seen, that post-office building crowded with hundreds of men waiting for the mail, impossible absolutely to obtain admission owing to the crowded and meager facilities afforded to the clerks of the post-office there, I am satisfied that you would admit without question that a much larger building was absolutely demanded for the wants of that business alone.

Now, it is the intention, as I understand the present proposition, to purchase a site and erect a building, and divide the business done between the present building and the new one proposed to be constructed. Omaha has to-day a population exceeding 112,000 people; it is growing very rapidly, and within a few years—a very few years—it will ask additional facilities for the transaction of the public business. This building, I understand, is recommended by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, is strongly urged by every officer of the Government whose attention has been called to the matter, and in my judgment it is so badly needed that I hope there will be no question as to the passage of the bill in the House.

Again, sir, let us take this as a mere business proposition, and if, in the judgment of the House, it is not needed, vote down the report of the conference committee; but if it is, vote them the money and let us do as a Government with regard to the Government business there just what individuals have done in regard to private matters. Within the last year four handsome bank buildings have been erected at a cost ranging from $150,000 to $500,000 each. The New York Life Insurance Company is putting up a building, simply as an investment, at an actual cost of $1,000,000, and the proprietor of the Omaha Daily Bee is erecting an office which I am informed will cost in the neighborhood of three-quarters of a million of dollars—simply a private enterprise, erected as an investment to meet the rapidly growing wants of the city for offices; and when we consider what private enterprise has done, it certainly is a recommendation to us to vote in favor of the pending proposition.

It is not necessary to consume the time of the House further to detail additional facts in reference to this matter showing the demand for this building. I hope the action of the House will be to adopt the report of the conference committee.

Mr. DIBBLE. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MAISH. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield to permit me to ask a question?

Mr. DIBBLE. Certainly.

Mr. MAISH. Can the gentleman from Nebraska state the dimensions of the present public building at Omaha?

Mr. DORSEY. I can not; but it is a very small building.

Mr. MAISH. The gentleman can not give the number of square feet it occupies?

Mr. DORSEY. No, sir; it is quite a small building. As I heretofore said a moment ago, when the site was purchased it was intended to enlarge the building, but owing to the fact that the adjacent property was in such a position that it could not be sold, the building was necessarily erected on a site which was manifestly too small.

Mr. MAISH. If the gentleman can not give the dimensions in feet, he can not answer the question I desired to ask.

I want, however, to propound another question. We authorized a short time ago the sale of the United States barracks there. Could not the land on which the barracks were located be utilized for a public building?

Mr. DORSEY. No, sir; that site is 2 miles distant from the present location.

Mr. MAISH. Why, it was represented as being right in the city.

Mr. DORSEY. Well, it is in the city; but you must remember that Omaha has between 112,000 and 120,000 people. It extends over a very considerable area, and the site of the barracks is fully 2 miles from the proper site for the post-office building.

Mr. MAISH. But I mean it is within the boundaries of the city?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, it is within the corporate limits; but not anywhere near the point where a post-office would be needed for the convenience of the patrons.

Mr. BYNUM. In what county is Omaha situated?

Mr. DORSEY. In Douglas County.

Mr. BYNUM. Does the gentleman know the population outside of the city?

Mr. DORSEY. Not exactly; but I suppose it is from 15,000 to 18,000.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask because I notice that the entire vote was only 8,000 in 1884.

Mr. DORSEY. That does not represent anything like the population. In 1885 we took a census in Nebraska, at which time Omaha showed a population of about 35,000. At the school census last taken Omaha shows a population of 112,000. I will state to the gentleman that we take our school census every year, upon which we can base the estimate of our population as accurately as if we had the regular Government census to guide us. It is a rapidly-growing city and the growth is continuous.

Mr. DIBBLE. I find that in the fiscal year 1887 the postal receipts of Omaha were $161,250 and the net receipts were $119,000. That is the post-office alone. I have not the figures here of the customs.

I now move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered.

The question recurred on the adoption of the report.

Mr. CRISP. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 45 members voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 81, nays 92, not voting 151.

Mr. MOORE with Mr. DARLINGTON, on all questions, Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. WADE. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. CLARDY], but have an arrangement which permits me to vote on this bill.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House insist upon its amendment, and ask a further conference.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. ELLIOTT, for ten days.

To Mr. BINGHAM, for one week.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 8285) to remove the political disabilities of Elliott Johnson.

The message also announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. SPOONER, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. DANIEL.

REVOCATION OF THE WITHDRAWAL OF LANDS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have a report of the Committee on Public Lands on House bill 11006, providing for the revocation of the withdrawal of lands made for the benefit of certain railroads, and for other purposes. I desire to have the bill read. It is a bill securing certain lands to bona fide settlers, and I think it comes within the privilege of the Committee on Public Lands. I will not press the bill beyond its reading if there is objection to it.

The bill, with the amendments reported by the committee, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 5 of an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," approved May 12, 1864, and section 7 of an act entitled "An act extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the States of Minnesota and Iowa, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1865, and also section 5 of an act entitled "An act making an additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid the construction of railroads in said State," approved July 4, 1866, so far as said sections are applicable to lands embraced within the indemnity limits of said grants, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 4 of an act approved June 2, 1864, and entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State,' approved May 15, 1856," be, and the same are hereby, repealed, so far as they require the Secretary of the Interior to reserve any lands but the odd sections within the primary or 6 miles granted limits of the roads mentioned in said act of June 2, 1864, or the act to which the same is amendatory; and all withdrawals of lands within indemnity limits heretofore made for the benefit of any road or roads, under or by virtue of said grants or any of them, and any reservations of lands made under said provisions of the act of June 2, 1864, shall be revoked, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to restore said lands to settlement and entry, after affording due opportunity, by such notice as he may consider proper to give to claimants under said grants, or any of them, to show cause why said restoration should not be made.

SEC. 3. That whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, a grant of lands heretofore made by the United States to aid in the construction of any rail or wagon road, canal, or other work of internal improvement has been adjusted, and he deems it advisable that said adjustment should be finally closed on the books of the Land Office, he shall cause such notice to be given, by advertisement or otherwise, as may seem to him proper, warning parties interested to come forward within three months and show cause why such adjustment should not be at once closed. If a proper showing be made he shall, as speedily as may be, determine the matters involved, awarding to said parties whatever they may be entitled to, and thereupon, or if no such showing be made, he shall at once direct the Commissioner of the General Land Office to close finally the adjustment of said grant and the same shall not thereafter be reopened. And after the closing of any such adjustment the Secretary shall revoke all withdrawals theretofore made for such grant, and restore to settlement and entry the land remaining undisposed of. But all lands restored to the public domain under the provisions of this act shall be disposed of to bona fide settlers only under the homestead laws, except section 2301 of the Revised Statutes: Provided, That in case any of such lands shall be, at the time of their restoration as aforesaid, actually occupied in good faith as a settler by any person who entered upon such land prior to the 1st day of January, 1888, and who had already exhausted his homestead right under existing laws, such person shall, notwithstanding, be allowed to enter again under the homestead laws the tract so occupied, not exceeding 160 acres: Provided, the privilege given hereby be exercised by formal entry at the proper land office within six months after such restoration.

SEC. 4. Nothing in this act shall be construed as ratifying or confirming any grant or certification of land heretofore made by Congress, or any Executive order made touching any public lands, or as recognizing the validity of any such Executive order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this bill, with the exception of certain amendments that were last read, was framed by the Secretary of the Interior, and was transmitted to the House through the President during the present session of Congress, and of course referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The object of the bill is this: In certain grants of land for railroad purposes in the State of Iowa the granting acts in effect withdraw the indemnity lands. They do not therefore seem to stand on the same footing as lands withdrawn by Executive order, and the Secretary is not certain of his power to restore them to the public domain under the general provisions of law, and for that reason the Secretary of the Interior asks the power to restore these lands and close the accounts of the corporations affected. Of course this in the main applies where the indemnity withdrawal was excessive. About 700,000 acres of this class of land in the State of Minnesota will be restored to the public domain, mainly, I think, of land granted to the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railroad, and other railroads of Minnesota.

Mr. STRUBLE. Does it apply to lands pertaining to the Sioux City and St. Paul road?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, I think not; for that is covered by the general forfeiture bill we have already passed, because the road, or at least a part of it, was not actually completed within the time prescribed by law. This bill, as I understand it, applies to roads which were completed within the time, and it applies only to the withdrawn indemnity lands. Now, Mr. Speaker, if no gentleman desires to be heard, I ask the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. LIND. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIND. This bill as it is now worded purports to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, after certain preliminary steps have been taken, to adjudicate the grant, to be absolutely closed?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

Mr. LIND. Now I wish to ask the gentleman if there is not danger of such a thing as this occurring: In Minnesota and some of the other States (as to Minnesota I know it to be a fact) lands in the granted limits have been erroneously certified to the State for the benefit of the railroad company. Under the act of March 3, 1887, the Secretary of the Interior was directed to institute suit, in conformity with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dunmeyer case, to recover those lands. I made an application in behalf of settlers in my district for such a suit over a year ago, but no action has yet been taken. Now, as to the particular railroad in question, the Winona and St. Peter, all the lands within the indemnity limit have been certified, so that the grant is practically closed already. Suppose the Secretary should, as soon as this bill becomes a law, cite that company to show cause why its grant should not be considered as settled and they showed no cause, and he decided that the grant was adjudicated and settled——

Mr. HOLMAN. He is required to do so, in terms, if the excess of indemnity lands has been restored.

Mr. LIND. Well, my question is, would that cut off the right of the Government to bring suit on behalf of the settlers to recover the lands within the granted limits that had been erroneously certified? If it would, I wish to offer an amendment to guard against that.

Mr. PAYSON. It would not.

Mr. HOLMAN. If by any possibility the bill could interfere with the right of the Government to recover those lands, of course it ought not to pass in its present form, but the last section expressly prevents that.

Mr. PAYSON. But if the gentleman from Indiana will permit me to make a suggestion, it can not by any possibility interfere with that right. We prevented an amendment to the bill this morning which provides that nothing in the bill shall be construed as ratifying or affirming any grant of land heretofore made by Congress or any executive order made touching any public lands, or as recognizing the validity of any such executive order. That is the last section of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the last section be again read.

The last section was again read.

Mr. LIND. I move to amend by inserting after the word "grant" the words "or certification."

Mr. McCULLOGH. Mr. Speaker, there is a provision in this bill for application by the settler within six months for additional homestead land. Now, ought there not to be some public notice required? People who live on farms do not often read acts of Congress, and it seems to me that if you allow only six months, the settler who has his homestead and who has cultivated an additional 160 acres of land ought to have some definite notice, in the county paper, for instance.

Mr. HOLMAN. He can take only a quarter-section under the homestead law.

Mr. McCULLOGH. I know; but this bill provides that where he has improved other lands alongside of his homestead, he may within six months go and make an entry.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not the provision.

Mr. McCULLOGH. Well, there is something in the bill about "six months;" and I say the settler ought to have notice.

Mr. HOLMAN. Great precaution has been taken by the committee against doing any possible injustice. I call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. PARKER. I wish to inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill whether the lands mentioned in it overlap, or have any connection with, or any relation to, the lands known as the Des Moines River lands?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; I think it does not apply to the Des Moines River lands. They are covered by another bill now pending.

Mr. PARKER. I did not know but what these lands might overlap them.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; this bill applies only, as I understand it, to grants where the road was constructed within the time prescribed by law, and applies only to indemnity lands.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to yield to me.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. NELSON. Only a minute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill relates mainly to lands in Minnesota. The withdrawal of indemnity lands, as they are called, was in this case made under the authority of a statute, being known as a legislative withdrawal as distinguished from an executive withdrawal. The Secretary of the Interior and the Land Department are of opinion that it is doubtful whether after the land grant has been adjusted and there is found to be an excess of indemnity lands, the Secretary of the Interior has authority without legislative sanction to restore that excess to market, to make it again a part of the public domain, open for homestead settlement. Hence, the object of this bill, so far as relates to Minnesota, is simply to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, whenever a land grant is adjusted and there is an excess of indemnity lands, to restore those lands to the public domain and make them open to homestead settlement. That is all there is in the bill, as I understand.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operations thereof the amendments reported by the Committee on the Public Lands were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OMAHA, NEBR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. McSHANE, and Mr. KENNEDY as conferees on the part of the House in the further conference with the Senate upon the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr.

LAND PATENT IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. WHEELER. I rise to submit the report of a committee of conference. I send the report to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1082) to authorize the issuance of patent to certain land in Arkansas, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said House amendment insert the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prejudice adverse rights occurring prior to the 4th of March, 1861, the date of the location of said warrant, and that, should conflicting claims be presented, the rights of the claimants shall be adjudicated by the Department as in other cases.

And the House agreed to the same.

WM. S. HOLMAN,
JOS. WHEELER,
L. E. PAYSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. M. TELLER,
JAMES H. BERRY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees, submitted in accordance with the rule, was read, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE HOUSE CONFEREES.

The House amendment as proposed to be amended by the conferees of the two Houses will read as follows: "Provided, nothing herein contained shall prejudice adverse rights accruing prior to the 4th of March, 1861, the date of the location of said warrant, and that, should conflicting claims be presented, the rights of the claimants shall be adjudicated by the Department as in other cases."

It will be seen that the provisions agreed upon by the conferees do not change the substance of the original amendment, except not to interfere with conflicting claims which arose prior to the date of the location of the land warrant in question. The House conferees recommend that the amendment as reported be concurred in.

Mr. WHEELER. I move the adoption of this report.

The report was adopted.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL MILITARY AND NAVAL MUSEUM.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Military Affairs, the consideration of which will take but a moment.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 23, 1888.

Mr. TOWNSHEND submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the House of Representatives what collections suitable to be embodied in a national military and naval museum are now in existence in their respective Departments, and what materials for the collections can be found in any of the arsenals, posts, navy-yards, and stations, and what further steps should be taken in order that an effective permanent exhibition may be made in this city illustrative of the history of military and naval invention, organization, construction and equipment in the United States and of the principal battles in which United States troops have been engaged, and they are respectively authorized in their discretion to detail one or more officers to aid in the preparation of the reports called for in this resolution, which reports shall contain any suggestions they may desire to make in regard to the establishment of a national and military and naval museum in the city of Washington of a scope and character similar to the museums now in existence in the principal cities of Europe."

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution calling upon the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy for information as to what collections suitable to be embodied in a national military and naval museum are now in existence in their respective Departments and what materials for such collection can be found in any of the arsenals, forts, navy-yards, stations, etc., report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it be adopted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This is simply a resolution of inquiry, which the Committee on Military Affairs report back favorably, asking its adoption.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. BURNES. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I now ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make from committees may file them with the Clerk.

There was no objection.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF EX-PRESIDENT ZACHARY TAYLOR.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, from the Committee on the Library, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2787) for the erection of an equestrian statue of ex-President Zachary Taylor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC PARK, GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, N. Y.

Mr. SPINOLA, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably joint resolution (H. Res. 176) granting permission to the park commissioners of New York City to improve and beautify Governor's Island in connection with a public park, to be laid out on said island and on land adjoining and connecting therewith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills, and the Clerk will report the pending amendment to the deficiency bill, which is the unfinished business.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the pending bill be laid aside in order to take up the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, before making objection I would like to know whether the Army appropriation bill is on the Calendar of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SAYERS. I have been furnished with the Calendar of yesterday, and it is not on it.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been placed upon the Calendar, possibly, since the Calendar was published.

Mr. SAYERS. When was it placed upon the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. On Saturday it was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SAYERS. But it was not placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It ought to be there, and the House so ordered.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. It may not be on the printed Calendar, but it is on the Calendar in the possession of the Clerk. The Calendar is not printed every day.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to know whether or not it has been actually placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Journal shows that it has been; for on last Saturday the House referred the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that it is upon the Calendar.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand that it was referred to the Calendar; but what I wish to know is whether the Calendar the Clerk has actually contains the indorsement of that reference; in other words, whether the bill is upon the Calendar or not.

The CHAIRMAN. It is on the Calendar.

Mr. SAYERS. I should like to know if it was put on when it was ordered by the House, or if it was put on the Calendar this morning?

The CHAIRMAN. At the time it was ordered by the House. It is the duty of the Clerk to make up the Calendar from day to day, as ordered by the House. The Public Calendar, however, is printed but twice a week.

Mr. SAYERS. This is dated on Monday, and it does not contain that bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman will look at the bill he will see by the indorsement upon it that it was placed on the Calendar last Saturday.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand that. The only objection I make is that it is not actually on the Calendar. I do not question that the order was made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is on the Calendar, unless the Clerk has been derelict in his duty.

Mr. SAYERS. But not placed there on last Saturday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already stated that it is on the Calendar.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I object to the consideration of the present bill, and under the rules that objection must be reported to the House. I raise the question of consideration as between these two appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects to the consideration of the deficiency bill, and asks that it be passed over for the present, and to that the gentleman from Texas objects. The committee will rise and the Chair will report that objection to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration general appropriation bills, had reached the consideration of the bill H. R. 10896 (the deficiency appropriation bill), when objection was made to passing over the bill, whereupon the committee rose and the Chair reported the objection to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House pass over the bill to which reference is made?

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 59, noes 28.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, a quorum not having voted, I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. BURNES and Mr. TOWNSHEND were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 67.

So the House directed the committee to pass over the bill.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the bill (H. R. 10896) is passed over for the present, and the Clerk will report the next appropriation bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10998) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial service, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object to the consideration of that bill, and ask that it be laid aside in order to reach the consideration of the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill. I hope my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] will agree that by unanimous consent this may be done, so as to save the time going back into the House.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that my objection to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill at this time is predicated upon the character of the amendments that have been offered by the Senate to the House bill. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois will agree that after a very short debate, for I merely want to explain to the House the character of the amendments, a vote shall be taken on instructing the conferees not to concur in such Senate amendments as we may agree upon, or make any compromise in reference thereto until the report is made and it is ordered by the House, we will have no trouble, and we will get through in a very few minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If I correctly understand the gentleman from Texas, there are three or four amendments relating to the appropriation for heavy ordnance and establishing a gun factory, and upon these amendments he asks that a vote be taken.

Mr. SAYERS. And repairs of fortifications.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And the gentleman desires that upon these amendments the vote shall be taken in the House.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Do I understand that this vote is to be taken in the House without debate sufficient to develop the character of these amendments?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. So far as the length of debate is concerned I can not control it, but I will simply state that the Committee on Military Affairs——

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is not true that the appropriations for heavy ordnance which were put in the bill by the Senate have heretofore been regarded by the House as properly belonging to the fortifications bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Since I have been a member of this House, now twelve years, I have no recollection of any such provision having been in the bill making appropriation for fortifications.

Mr. BLOUNT. I only wish to say this in reference to that appropriation, that it has got to be the practice on the part of the Senate to attach provisions to House bills which are greater than——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not wish to interrupt my friend from Georgia, but the only question for the House is what we are to do with these amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend need not be so uneasy about it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman wants to run that kind of a schedule on the House, he will find before he gets through that he can not do so.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10234) making an appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Senate amendments to this bill. The Clerk will read the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, in line 103, after the word "of," insert "not exceeding fifty."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move non-concurrence in that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, in line 104, after the words "contract surgeons," insert "not exceeding one hundred and sixty."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask non-concurrence in that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this amendment will be non-concurred in. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, in line 105, after the word "and," insert "not exceeding fourteen."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask non-concurrence in that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he can take a vote in gross upon all the amendments down to the twenty-sixth, on page 19. There is where the trouble begins.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and ask that the House vote in gross upon all amendments except those amendments that are designated.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas please designate the amendments to which he refers?

Mr. SAYERS. Amendment 26, amendment 27, amendment 33, and amendment 35.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I suggest to my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] that he does not want concurrence in amendment 35. That relates to the purchase of additional land at West Point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] asks unanimous consent that the House non-concur in all the Senate amendments except those numbered 26, 27, 33, and 35.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, my motion for the present is this: I ask unanimous consent to non-concur in all amendments up to No. 26, not including that amendment.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now ask to have the same order made as to amendment No. 35, which relates solely to the purchase of additional ground at West Point for educational purposes. Has the gentleman from Texas any objection to letting the House non-concur in that amendment?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir; I have no objection, down to section 3.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I ask unanimous consent to non-concur in section 2, of amendment 35.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask the House to non-concur in all the other amendments, and I make that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. That embraces section 3?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. All the remaining amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the committee can not non-concur in a portion of a Senate amendment and concur in another portion of it. As these are amendments between the two Houses, the rule is that the committee can only concur with an amendment, or without an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then, Mr. Chairman, my motion now is, acting under instructions from the Committee on Military Affairs, that the House non-concur in all the remaining amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. That will include No. 35.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That includes 26 and all the remaining amendments.

Mr. SAYERS. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] so as to provide that the House non-concur in the amendments designated by him, and that the conferees upon the part of the House be instructed not to agree to these amendments or to any modification of them until report shall have been made to the House, and the House, by a yea-and-nay vote, shall have instructed them otherwise.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the gentleman from Texas will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] will yield to me for a moment before insisting on that motion. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] his reason for asking non-concurrence in these items, and, if he will allow me to go a little further before he answers, I want to ask him whether or not his objection goes to the extent that he does not consider these appropriations as germane to the Army bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The first question that the gentleman from Georgia asks me I am ready to answer. He perhaps misunderstands my position. I am instructed by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Military Affairs to ask non-concurrence in these amendments, and I have made that motion. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has moved to amend my motion. I am with the gentleman from Georgia upon that proposition. I am the mover of the motion to non-concur upon every amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. But if my friend will listen to me for a moment, he will find that I have not misunderstood him at all. I have asked for his reasons for moving non-concurrence. There might be many reasons.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. Before the gentleman from Georgia proceeds any further, I ask to have the amendments read so that the House may understand what question is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments, beginning with amendment numbered 26.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it in order to move to non-concur in these amendments in gross? Have we not a right to have a separate vote on each amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to move to concur in all the amendments. It is the privilege of any gentleman to demand a division.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I demand a division. Gentlemen from the interior may fix this matter to suit themselves, but the coast has something to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report amendment numbered 26.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, after line 27, insert: "For repairs to sea-wall and wharf at Willets Point, N. Y., $2,500."

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask——

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman from Texas will permit me, I now renew my question to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. I ask his reasons for recommending non-concurrence in the amendments relating to fortifications. Before he answers let me make myself understood. The gentleman's answer awhile ago was that he concurred with me, and that his committee had instructed him to move non-concurrence. For myself, and I am sure I am not alone on this side of the House, there is a feeling that this amendment is not germane to this bill. Under the rules of the House the subject to which this relates has been referred to another committee, to wit, the Committee on Appropriations, and we are not willing that the Senate shall subvert our modes of procedure by taking from a committee which may perhaps be unfavorable to the views of the Senate the consideration of a subject which this House has referred to it, and referring that subject to another committee which may perhaps entertain a different view.

It is from that standpoint I wish to ask my friend from Illinois whether he is asking non-concurrence because he wants to defer to the will of this House, as indicated in its rules, that this matter shall not be treated in that way, but must be put upon a proper bill by the Senate and be considered and acted on by the proper committee of this House—whether that consideration has entered into the view of the Military Committee in instructing the gentleman to make this motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does the gentleman want an answer now?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the motion which the gentleman from Texas desires to submit is not in order at this time. The Committee of the Whole can only recommend to the House non-concurrence; and when the question comes before the House the gentleman from Texas may then move non-concurrence with instructions. The Committee of the Whole can not appoint conferees and can not instruct them. The only report this committee can make is a recommendation of concurrence or non-concurrence. Upon the report of the Committee of the Whole, it will be the province of the House to determine whether the conferees who may hereafter be appointed shall be instructed in reference to their duty on this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the Chair will allow the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to make a response to my question. I was not making any motion, but asking for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had no wish to interfere with any of the gentleman's rights in regard to the discussion of this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand the Chair would not purposely do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was stating the parliamentary procedure, according to which, in the opinion of the Chair, it is in order to move to concur or non-concur in all of these amendments, but it is also the privilege of any member to call for a separate vote on any amendment. In order to preserve the regularity of parliamentary proceeding the amendments will now be read by the Clerk.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the Chair decline to allow the gentleman from Illinois to answer my question?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all; but the Chair declines to entertain any business until the question has been properly placed before the Committee of the Whole. When the question has been properly stated it will then be open for discussion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have seen sometimes a different practice, when members have been allowed to obtain information.

The CHAIRMAN. The correct practice, in the opinion of the Chair, is to have the question properly stated in the first instance to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, is it not true that under the rules we can dispose of these amendments one at a time, instead of having them all read before we dispose of any?

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the amendments was demanded; and as the motion which had been made covered all the amendments, it was the duty of the Chair to direct the Clerk to read all the amendments. It is the privilege of any member to call for a division of the question.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. My point of order is, that when one of these amendments has been read it is the right of any member to demand a division of the question and a vote upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so stated.

Mr. ROGERS. As I understand, one amendment has been read, and a division on that has been demanded.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is not the pending motion that of the gentleman from Illinois, to non-concur?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois was to non-concur in all these amendments; and the reading of them was demanded, as the Chair understood.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman from New Jersey demanded a division of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the gentleman's right; but before the question can be put upon non-concurring in any of these amendments they must all be read, if it is insisted upon, because the motion of the gentleman from Illinois included them all. The Clerk will read the remaining amendments.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of all the amendments together be dispensed with, and that they be considered seriatim

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] allow me to suggest that the only amendments on which the gentleman from Texas desires to have an expression of the views of the House are those pertaining to the proposition relating to the establishment of a gun factory, the purchase of steel for coast-defense guns, etc. Now, it strikes me we shall economize time by allowing all these amendments to be read, and acting on them in gross.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There is objection to acting on them in gross.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made to dispensing with the reading, the Clerk will read all the amendments.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND (interrupting the reading). All the amendments, from 28 to 32, inclusive, relate to an entirely different subject, and I ask my friends from Massachusetts and Texas to agree that these may be non-concurred in in gross, as they do not relate to the question about which the gentleman from Texas makes his objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, these amendments will be non-concurred in in gross.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Amendment numbered 33 was read, as follows:

(33) For the manufacture or purchase and tests of cannon and carriages, including two 10-inch carriages maneuvered by power, one of which shall be a disappearing carriage, and also including those for the field and siege services; for the alteration of carriages on hand to adapt them to improved service guns; for projectiles, and increased facilities for their manufacture, powders, fuzes, and implements, their trial and proof; for experiments in the means of protecting torpedo lines; for compensation of draughtsmen while employed in the Army Ordnance Bureau on ordnance construction, and for the necessary expenses of ordnance officers while temporarily employed at the proving ground and absent from their proper stations, at the rate of $2.50 per diem while so employed, $600,000: Provided, That all purchases of materials under this provision, excepting samples, shall be of American manufacture: Provided, That of the above sum $10,000 may be used for increasing facilities for the manufacture of projectiles.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The next amendment, numbered 34, relates to the Signal Service, and bears no relation to the proposition to which the gentleman from Texas desires an expression of opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read amendment numbered 35, as follows:

(35) SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be authorized to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the 225 acres of land on the Hudson River, directly south of the military reservation at West Point, belonging to the estate of Edward V. Kinsley, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary for the purposes of the Military Academy, and to receive offers for the sale of their interest in such land from such of the heirs of said Kinsley as are competent and willing to sell such interests; and the Secretary of War is authorized to submit all offers so made and the question of the value of said 225 acres to a board to consist of three Army officers and three competent civilians, who shall make due investigation and report concerning said value; and the Secretary of War shall submit said offers and the report of said board, with his opinion, to Congress, at its next session. The expenses of said board and compensation at the rate of $10 a day for not more than ten days for each of the civilian members shall be paid from the appropriation for contingencies of the War Department.

SEC. 3. For the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an army gun factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., in accordance with the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board of February 16, 1884, $750,000.

SEC. 4. For the purchase of rough-finished, oil-tempered, and annealed steel for high-power coast-defense guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch caliber, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection at each stage of the manufacture, and including all the parts of each caliber, $5,000,000: Provided, That no money shall be expended except for steel accepted and delivered.

SEC. 5. The material for the guns provided for in section 4 shall be purchased in accordance with section 3709, Revised Statutes, for which purpose the Secretary of War is authorized to make contracts with responsible steel manufacturers, after proper advertisement, continuing not less than thirty days in the newspapers most likely to reach the said manufacturers: Provided, That each bidder with whom such contracts shall be made shall agree to erect in the United States a suitable plant, including the best modern appliances, capable of making all the steel required, and of finishing it in accordance with the contracts, and shall further agree to deliver yearly a specified quantity of each caliber, the time of the delivery of the steel for the smaller calibers of heavy guns to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months, and that for the largest calibers specified in the advertisement at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contracts; and that all the material for said guns shall be manufactured in the United States.

SEC. 6. For the purchase of submarine mines, for needful casemates, cable galleries, and appliances to operate submarine mines; for continuing torpedo experiments and for practical instruction of engineer troops in the details of torpedo service, $500,000.

SEC. 7. For the purchase of submarine controllable torpedoes or torpedoes and torpedo-boats controllable from shore and adapted to coast defense, $100,000.

SEC. 8. The appropriations provided for in sections 3, 4, 6, and 7 shall be available until expended.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the demand for a division the vote will be first taken on amendment numbered 26, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs to sea-wall and wharf at Willets Point, New York, $2,500.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that what I have to say on this subject may as well be said now as at any other time, and I would like very much to have the attention of this committee to two propositions which I shall submit to them.

The first proposition involves the dignity and the power of this House to regulate its own methods of procedure. This is a very grave question, and members should not lightly nor rapidly pass over its consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to state, in the first place, that I have no personal feeling in this matter. I have been resisting the immediate consideration of these amendments to the Army appropriation bill only that the House might have an opportunity not only of considering them in reference to the effect which their adoption might have upon the power and dignity of the House, but also because of their relation to an extravagant expenditure of the public money, which is not at all necessary at this particular time.

By turning to amendment numbered 26, which has just been read, it will be found that this, the first amendment of which I complain, provides for the repair of a sea-wall and wharf at Willets Point, New York, and proposes to appropriate the sum of $2,500 for this purpose. At the commencement of the Forty-ninth Congress, when the power of this House, so far as the question of considering and reporting bills was concerned, was under consideration, the House allotted certain powers to the different committees, and it was especially provided that the question of fortifications should belong solely and exclusively to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Committee on Rules in reporting these rules uses this language:

The fortification bill, being one relating jointly to Army and Navy fortifications and the general public defense, is left with the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations has not neglected that duty. A bill has been reported to this House providing for repairs of all kinds, in accordance with the policy heretofore pursued by Congress. While the Army bill was pending the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY], I believe, proposed an amendment, and after much discussion by gentlemen who are well acqainted with parliamentary usage and procedure, the chairman of the committee, upon a question of order being raised as to the propriety of the amendment being placed upon the bill, sustained the point of order, and that was the last of it in this House, so far as the Military Committee is concerned, until now.

I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment to which I have just referred, which is found on page 5804 of the RECORD, and also to read the ruling of the Chair as found upon page 5810.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

For the manufacture or purchase and test of cannon and carriages; for the alteration of carriages on hand to adapt them to improved service guns; for projectiles, powders, fuzes, and implements, their trial and proof; for experiments in the means of protecting torepdo lines; for compensation of draughtsmen while employed in the Army Ordnance Bureau on ordnance construction, and for the necessary expenses of ordnance officers while temporarily employed at the proving-ground and absent from their proper stations, at the rate of $2.50 per diem while so employed, $500,000.

For the erection of the necessary structures, and for the purchase or manufacture of machinery, tools, and fixtures, to enlarge the present plant at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., including the erection of two sets of officers' quarters at a cost of not exceeding $10,000 each, $126,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the point of order against that amendment.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] makes the point of order that the proposed amendment, if reported at all, should be reported in the bill known as the fortifications bill, which, by Rule XI, clause 3, is committed to the Committee on Appropriations; and also that the clause in the second paragraph of this amendment providing for the erection of "necessary structures" comes within the provisions of clause 3, of Rule XXI, as not being a work already authorized by law. The Chair is of opinion that the second clause of this proposition, namely, that which provides for the erection of the necessary structures to enlarge the plant at Watervliet arsenal is not an object heretofore authorized by law. "Additional structure" would cover any kind of a public building which the Department might deem necessary for this purpose. Hence this is not a work previously authorized by law, and that part of the amendment is obnoxious to clause 3, of Rule XXI, and the point of order is sustained.

As to the other point, there might, perhaps, be some doubt as to what bill this should be reported in. The attention of the Chair has been called by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] and others to clause 11 of Rule XI, which provides that all legislation in reference to the military establishment and the public defense, including appropriation for its support, shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The attention of the Chair has also been called to the decision of the gentleman who occupied the chair when the naval appropriation bill was under consideration at the last session of Congress. At that time the Chairman of the committee held that a proposition for the purchase of guns for the use of the Navy was an object previously provided for by law and that the appropriation was a continuation of such work.

The present occupant of the chair, had he presided at that time, would doubtless have made a similar decision; but if it were now proposed to appropriate a sum of money for the armament of ships it certainly would not be contended that that was in order upon this bill, although it might be held to be necessary for the public defense. The words "the public defense," in clause 11 of Rule XI, refer to such public defense as is committed to the Army of the United States, and as clause 3 of this rule has committed the subject of fortifications to the Appropriations Committee, all provisions for public defense to be made by fortifications should go to that committee, just as all provisions for the public defense relating to the Navy should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Secretary of War has transmitted to the committee certain letters, among them one from the Chief of Ordnance, to the effect that this appropriation is desired for the armament of fortifications. The Chair will take cognizance of the fact that the proper officials of the Government who have communicated this matter to Congress have stated that the appropriation is for the purpose of providing armament for fortifications, and such being its object, it should be reported in the fortifications bill as provided in clause 3 of Rule II.

For these reasons the Chair sustains the point of order as to both propositions.

Mr. SAYERS. This ruling, Mr. Chairman, was concurred in by the committee, and I have never, either publicly or privately, heard this ruling called in question.

I would have no objection to a simple non-concurrence if the members of the Committee on Military Affairs had not in the most solemn and emphatic form committed themselves to the policy of these amendments. In making this remark I do not intend to reflect upon any member of that committee, but in order that this committee may well understand that in the absence of direct and positive instructions these amendments, when they go into a conference between the two Houses, will have no opposition on the part of the conferees of the House.

I wish to call attention to House bill 8465. The provisions of that bill are word for word the same as these Senate amendments. Who prepared that bill? The gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] both introduced bills of a kindred character and had them referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and bill 8465 has been reported to the House by that committee in lieu of them; the report of the committee upon the bill concluding with the statement that each and every member was in favor of the propositions as contained therein. The provisions of this bill are identically the same as these amendments. Now, what is the action of the Senate when the Army bill reaches that body? It had already had the experience of two years upon this very question.

All during the Forty-ninth Congress there was a struggle between the House and the Senate as to whether these amendments should pass into law or not; and they failed. The Committee on Appropriations had made its record, and so soon as the Army bill went into the Senate that body abandoned its effort to induce the Committee on Appropriations to agree with it and the amendments were put upon the Army bill, which under the rules of this House is not the appropriate place for them. What, then, is the proposition? It is simply this—the Senate has by its action, in placing these amendments upon the Army bill, which the House had previously decided to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, practically nullified one of the most important rules which have been established for its government.

This is the question, and it is a very important one. Will the House without objection or protest, yield up the right to regulate and to control its own methods of procedure?

The Senate might with equal propriety have attached these amendments to a bill emanating from the Judiciary Committee of the House and affecting only the jurisdiction of the Federal courts.

I do not question the power of the Senate in this matter. Each House has the perfect right to adopt, for its own government, such rules and regulations as it may deem proper, provided only that they are consistent with the Constitution. In this each House is entirely independent of the other.

But what I would impress upon the committee is this, that neither House ought, in an indirect manner and to accomplish a purpose, annul or modify any rule or regulation of the other. There can be no question but that under the rules of the House the subject-matter of these amendments is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations. It has been so decided, and the decision has never been controverted. If the action of the Committee on Military Affairs, in preparing and reporting House bill 8465, is any indication of the true opinion of that committee, and its sincerity can not be called in question, then it may be safely said that the members of that committee are in strict accord with the Senate as to the subject-matter of these amendments. Such being the case, Mr. Chairman, it becomes the more important that the House should express itself in the most emphatic manner before they go into the hands of the conferees of the two Houses.

If no expression is given by the House upon the subject, then I respectfully submit that the settlement of the differences between the Houses will require but small time and will be one merely of form. The conferees on the part of the House will have in their minds agreed to the amendments before the conference shall have been held. I sincerely believe that this is a question of great importance, and this House should deal with it in a calm and dispassionate manner, yet so firmly as to obviate any future difficulty of a similar nature. Let the precedent as involved in the action of the Senate in this matter be once firmly established and acquiesced in and it is my firm conviction that there will be but little safety in the methods established by either House for its own procedure, because it may be practically and effectually annulled by the other body, though in an indirect manner, as in the present instance. Each House should respect the rules and regulations of the other. In no other way can harmony be preserved and wise legislation be promoted.

Again, Mr. Chairman, in these amendments will be found a provision for the immediate purchase of $5,000,000 worth of steel. Why is this? Can there be a pressing necessity for so large an expenditure at this time? Is war pending? Are there any rumors of war? Why, sir, with our present appliances such a quantity of steel could not be profitably consumed in twenty years. We are informed by the very best authority upon the subject, that the Watervliet arsenal as now constituted, can only consume about $200,000 worth of steel per annum.

If the $750,000 item embraced in these amendments be appropriated, we are advised by the same authority, a most active and intelligent officer in the Ordnance Bureau, that it can not be properly expended within a shorter time than four years from this date. Where, then, is the urgency or propriety for so large a purchase of steel at this time? It may be an easy way to reduce the surplus in the Treasury. It may be very beneficial to a very few manufacturers. It may be of small moment to some gentlemen upon this floor.

But the necessity does not now exist for so large an appropriation. It would be a useless and an extravagant expenditure. Besides this, steel is becoming cheaper every year, and a proper regard for economy would suggest that the Government should be in a position to avail itself of the falling prices.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I am clearly of the opinion that the conferees on the part of the House should be instructed not to agree to these amendments or to any modification of them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The remarks that have been made by the gentleman from Texas would have been more pertinent if they had been reserved until a motion should have been presented to this House asking for concurrence in the amendments that have been placed upon this bill by the Senate. The motion that I have submitted in obedience to the instructions of the Committee on Military Affairs is to non-concur in these amendments, and it seems that the gentleman from Texas is heartily in accord with the Committee on Military Affairs in that proposition. I therefore do not see that there is any ground for the point of order at this time upon the motion before the committee. As the gentleman has, however, made some remarks in regard to the rightful jurisdiction of these two committees, it is proper that I should say to the House that the Committee on Military Affairs has already in reference to the Tracey and Cutcheon bill, and the action of the Committee on Military Affairs upon it, read and examined the rules of the House, and come to the conclusion that it had full jurisdiction of the bills that it reported upon that question; and I will now say that the Committee on Military Affairs was warranted in that by one of the rules which confers upon it jurisdiction in military affairs.

In order to show that the Committee on Military Affairs was warranted in assuming that it had jurisdiction, I refer to the rule of the House which confers jurisdiction upon the several committees. I ask attention to the eleventh clause of Rule XI. After stating in the beginning that "all proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the following rule, as follows," it provides that subjects relating "to the military establishment and the public defense, including the appropriations for its support, and for that of the Military Academy," shall go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The House, then, by its rules has conferred upon the Committee on Military Affairs jurisdiction on all subjects relating to the military establishment and the public defense and the Military Academy. Now, what is the nature of this bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion just there?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am discussing the bill which the gentleman has been criticising.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not going to take you away from that. My question is right in that line. The gentleman, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, has been reciting the jurisdiction of his committee, and he has read the rule on that subject, which provides that all subjects relating to the military establishment and to the public defense, including the appropriations for its support and that of the Military Academy, shall be referred to that committee. I wish now to ask the gentleman whether he wishes the House to understand that he thinks that the subject of appropriations for fortifications is carried by that language to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman presents an entirely different question from that presented by the gentleman from Texas. I am now addressing myself to the position taken by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]. When I get through with him, then I shall be ready to meet the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Coming back now to the question raised by the gentleman from Texas, I have read the rule which defines the jurisdiction belonging to the Committee on Military Affairs. The House has assigned to that committee all subjects relating to the military establishment; further, all subjects relating to the public defense; further, all subjects relating to the Military Academy. That is the jurisdiction of the Military Committee. Now, I maintain that the bill which the gentleman has referred to, and which the Military Committee some months ago reported favorably to this House, relates exclusively to the public defense and the military establishment, and I defy any gentleman to show that there is one word in that bill which does not relate to the military establishment and to the public defense.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am now simply seeking to vindicate the action of the Committee on Military Affairs in reporting the bill to which gentlemen have referred here.

Mr. CANNON. My question is right in that line. The gentleman claims that his committee has jurisdiction of all matters pertaining to the public defense; would that include revenue bills?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, sir; because the raising of revenue is not a military operation; it is not a military act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs, upon examination of the bill that was presented to it, came to the conclusion that it had jurisdiction, and I maintain that from the reading of the rule there can not be a single particle of doubt in the mind of any intelligent man that the Committee on Military Affairs had full jurisdiction in that case.

Having jurisdiction of the question, and the bill being before us and the Committee on Military Affairs being of the opinion that something should be done to provide means for the defense of our coasts and harbors, they presented to this House a bill which they believe is a wise and economical measure and which should be speedily passed. That bill is now upon the Calendar. What further did that committee do? When we came to prepare the military bill we confined ourselves to the precedents and the practices of this House which have prevailed here ever since I have been a member, and I will say now to my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] that if he will examine the military bill as it left the Committee on Military Affairs and left this House, he will fail to find a single provision in it which is not in accordance with the practice and precepts of this House governing the preparation of Army appropriation bills.

Mr. SAYERS. Neither the gentleman nor any member of the House has heard me question any item in the military bill as it was reported by the committee. What I am questioning is what has been put upon the bill by the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am simply seeking to justify the action of the Military Committee in what it has done. My friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] seemed to be criticising the committee for having assumed to report back to this House a bill which had been referred to that committee by the unanimous action of the House. What should we have done with that bill? This House had passed judgment upon the nature of what is known as the Cutcheon and Tracey bill when it sent it to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that was the time for the gentleman from Texas to have raised this question; and, as he is so jealous of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, I ask him why he did not, as a vigilant member of that committee, which we all know him to be, question at that time the right of the House to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. SAYERS. In answer to the gentleman I will say that the first time I ever heard of the bill was after the Senate began to work upon your military bill. I then examined the Calendar and found the other bill, and saw that you and the Senate were walking into the same hole. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am sorry that my friend confesses to the House that he was more neglectful of his duties as a member of the Committee on Appropriations than I thought he was.

Mr. SAYERS. When the gentleman has worn his uniform and sword about four years longer he will find that it is impossible to watch the boys when they are running about at night. [Laughter.] He will find that he can not always keep his men inside of the line. The gentleman has had his sword and cockade on only a few months yet, and there is still danger of the sword getting between his legs and tumbling him over. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand it to be necessary that a member of Congress should wear a cockade or a military uniform in order that he may be qualified to represent the constituency that sent him here either as to questions affecting the military establishment or any other question concerning the interests of this Government.

But the gentleman is begging the question. I desire to hold him to this fact: That the House has twice conferred jurisdiction upon the Committee on Military Affairs over the bill to which he has alluded: first, when the rules were formed; and, second, when the House at this session, by its own deliberate act and without any question being raised, intrusted that bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. In response to the demand of the House for action on that bill the Committee on Military Affairs have exercised their conscientious convictions by reporting it favorably to the House.

Mr. SAYERS. I am informed that a point of order has already been raised on that bill reported by you.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I can not understand how a point of order can have been raised against it when it has been reported, placed on the Calendar, and never reached for consideration. The gentleman may be able to conceive how a point of order can be raised on a bill that has not been called up for action. But that is a matter of no consequence—a mere trifle.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will allow me, I will inform him that points of order can be reserved at the time a bill is reported from a committee, and that I made such a reservation in this case.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But, Mr. Chairman, let me come back to the point. The gentleman from Texas seems to be very much alarmed at the extravagance shown by this amendment. I am very much surprised that the gentleman should make a point like that, for I hold in my hand a bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations by the gentleman from Texas himself, which contains not only these identical provisions carrying all the money covered by the Senate amendment, but more than that, an increased appropriation.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not want the gentleman to make any mistake. Instead of appropriating $5,000,000, we propose to appropriate $1,500,000.

Mr. LAIRD. The "mistake" is that the gentleman from Texas and the Appropriations Committee do not propose to do anything and the Military Committee does.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hold in my hand the bill reported by the gentleman from Texas. It is entitled:

A bill making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense—

That word does not occur in the definition of the jurisdiction conferred on the Committee on Appropriations; it does occur in the statement of the jurisdiction conferred upon the Committee on Military Affairs—for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Sir, the only committee which has transcended its jurisdiction in this matter is the Committee on Appropriations.

As my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAISH] suggests, the Committee on Appropriations not only seeks to provide for a few old forts that the Government possesses, but has undertaken to make provision for field guns. And by their bill they propose to deny to the Committee on Military Affairs jurisdiction in regard to the erection of seawalls, a matter not legitimately within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations.

But I have been led away from the purpose with which I arose. The gentleman says it is extravagant to appropriate $6,000,000, as the Senate has done, for public defense or the fortification of the coast; but he himself came in last week with a bill asking this House to appropriate $19,481,000 for these same purposes. Here is the bill; and here is the report which the gentleman wrote to accompany it. I will read some extracts from that report.

Mr. SAYERS. Read it all.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is too lengthy to be published entire. I do not want to encumber the RECORD. What does the gentleman say? He says:

The estimates upon which the bill is based will be found in the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1889, pages 177 and 178, and aggregate $8,239,000.

And what does he do with the estimates upon which this bill purports to be based? He ignores the estimates; he doubles the amount proposed in the estimates, and asks this House to pass a bill which will cause an appropriation of over $19,000,000. He says in this report:

The accompanying bill appropriates $6,202,670, and if the provisions of section 6 of the bill result in the procurement for the Government of the guns, mortars, and carriages therein described, a further appropriation will be necessary of not exceeding, in the aggregate, $13,215,438.

And this amount, added to the sums directly appropriated by the bill, makes over $19,000,000.

Now, then, I have simply desired to put the House in possession of these facts in order to show that the Committee on Military Affairs exercised its rightful jurisdiction in reporting the bill. Upon the question of extravagance, if there has been extravagance, it is not upon the Military Committee the charge would rest, but upon the Appropriations Committee in overriding the estimates of the Department more than double.

But let us get down to the real question before the House. The gentleman confesses that the Army appropriation bill reported from the Military Committee was a bill entirely within the jurisdiction of the committee. It came from the committee without a clause in it which he could question. It passed the House without the addition of a clause to it which the gentleman would question. Now, the Senate passed certain amendments and placed them upon the bill. Have we sought in that to arrogate to ourselves jurisdiction? Not at all.

When the Senate amendments came before the Military Committee, they unanimously authorized me to report the bill back with the recommendation to non-concur in every amendment. We have not sought anywhere to arrogate to ourselves a single scintilla of authority that had not been conferred upon the committee by the rules of the House; and I stand here now asking this House to non-concur in these amendments, and to send them to a committee of conference, and permit the conferees to meet and do as they ought to do, act upon their own judgments and upon such information as the Senate conferees may give them; and when so acting upon their conscience and judgment as Representatives of the House, they come back with a report from that committee, then it will be in order for the House to determine whether that action meets with its sanction or otherwise.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from Illinois, being hard pressed, referred in the close of his argument to a bill that has been reported to the House by the Committee on Appropriations. He was, however, very disingenuous. He alluded to the amount of appropriation for which that bill provides without reference to the time in which it is to be expended. Now, I am desirous that the report which accompanies that bill may appear in the RECORD in order that every member may have the opportunity to read it and to ascertain for himself the true character of every provision recommended by the committee. The gentleman from Illinois was opposed on last Saturday to the incorporation of the Senate amendments in the RECORD. He said it would be too expensive; but he comes here to-day and indirectly advocates the immediate expenditure of $5,000,000 for steel to be wasted, or utilized, as the case may be, by the ordnance officers of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am sure my friend from Texas does not want to misrepresent my position. I am asking the House to reject that proposition. But my friend places me in the position, or endeavors to do so, of prejudging the action of the House.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman has placed himself in that position and he can not get out of it, because the gentleman concurs in the report of a bill which has come to the House from his committee and which is identically the same as some of the Senate amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As to the policy of making appropriations, I am in favor of it. That I do not deny. But as to the question whether they should go upon the Army appropriation bill, I have not been called on to determine.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is growing nervous. The bill, Mr. Chairman, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations, does provide for the expenditure of about $13,000,000 for the manufacture of guns, but it proposes to expend only $1,500,000 for the purchase of steel. There is a wide difference between the Senate amendments and the fortification bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations, taken as a whole.

The Senate amendments would confine the manufacture of guns to the Government. The fortification bill, now pending in the House and reported by the Committee on Appropriations, indicates a different and, I believe, a wiser policy. It not only contemplates the improvement of the Watervliet arsenal and supplies it with a sufficient amount of steel—say $1,500,000, not $5,000,000, as the gentleman from Illinois and the Senate would have—but it also looks to the manufacture of ordnance by the private industries of the country. By so doing it creates competition between the Government arsenal and the outside world. This I consider of the very highest importance. It will not do to rely upon the Government alone for the construction of guns. France tried it, and in the hour of her greatest emergency the policy proved fatal to her.

The bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations provides for the purchase of guns, only after they have been sufficiently tested and proven to be equal to the very best, wherever manufactured. Until so tested and accepted not a dollar of the public money is expended for them. The Government takes no risk whatever. The manufacturer assumes all the risk. If his guns meet every requirement, he is paid for them. If they should fail, he is the loser, not the public Treasury.

Again, it is estimated by a most intelligent expert—an experienced officer of the Army—that all of these guns can not be manufactured before the expiration of thirteen years.

The bill also provides for a commission, to be appointed by the President—three from the Army and three from civil life—and that no action can be taken without the concurrence of five members.

Annual reports are to be made to Congress by the commission, and appropriations are made only as they may become necessary. The interests of the Government are most carefully guarded. But that the bill may be the better understood, I submit to the committee the report which accompanies it, and I ask for the report the most careful perusal by every member of the House:

The Committee on Appropriations, in presenting the accompanying bill making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, submit the following in explanation thereof:

The estimates upon which the bill is based will be found in the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1889, pages 177 and 178, and aggregate $8,239,000.

No appropriation has been made for fortifications and the armament thereof during the past two fiscal years.

The fortification appropriation act for the fiscal year 1886, which was the last one passed, appropriated $725,000.

The accompanying bill appropriates $6,202,670, and if the provisions of section 6 of the bill result in the procurement for the Government of the guns, mortars, and carriages therein described, a further appropriation will be necessary of not exceeding, in the aggregate, $13,215,438, and in sums of not more than $2,500,000 in any one fiscal year.

The following statement is submitted, more fully explaining the provisions of the bill and by way of analysis;

Section 1 appropriates as follows:

For the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications and other works of defense, $100,000.

For construction of sea-walls and for earth embankments, $117,000.

For torpedoes for harbor defense, $200,000.

Section 2: Provision is made in this section of the bill for the procurement of certain experimental guns and carriages and their test, in order to establish types for the service; the development of new powders and of steel projectiles for armor-piercing purposes. Suitable projectiles of this class have not as yet been worked up in this country. Besides providing for various experiments with powders, projectiles, fuses, etc., for the purchase of machine guns, and for the purchase of two 3.2-inch aluminum bronze field-guns, if found satisfactory after test, provision is also made to enable the Department to alter about seventy-five carriages of those on hand, to adapt them to improved service guns, and to purchase material for and manufacture about twenty-five field guns with their carriages complete. Provision is also made for the incidental expenses of the proving-ground and carrying on tests there, and for the compensation of draughtsmen while employed on ordnance construction.

The object of this section is to enable the Department to go on with its current work in the production of guns, carriages, etc., in establishing types for the service, and providing a small supply for issue.

Section 3 provides for the completion of certain guns the construction of which was undertaken by the Ordnance Department under authority of law, and which could not be completed within the time during which the appropriation was applicable.

Section 4: This section provides for the erection of an army gun factory at the Watervliet arsenal, for the finishing and assembling of heavy ordnance, in accordance with the recommendations of the Gun Foundry Board. For this purpose $750,000 are to be appropriated. Of this sum $350,000 are for the buildings and shrinking-pit requisite for the manufacture of guns up to 16-inch caliber; $380,000 are for the machinery, tools, etc., requisite for the manufacture of guns up to 12-inch caliber, that being the limit to which the Department thought it advisable to proceed at the outset with an establishment of this character; and the remaining $20,000 are for the erection of two sets of officers' quarters. These quarters are now essential, as more officers will be required at the arsenal in connection with the work contemplated to be done there. The estimate for tools and machines is above that given by the Gun Foundry Board, and is necessitated from the tools being manufactured in this country, many of them being of very large size, as the gun lathes, and must be specially made to order.

This section also appropriates $1,500,000 for the purchase of rough-finished, oil-tempered, and annealed steel for high-power guns for coast defense, of 8, 10, and 12 inch calibers. This sum should procure about 2,115 tons of steel forgings, which should furnish the material for about thirty 8-inch guns, twenty-four 10-inch guns, and twelve 12-inch guns. The finished weights of these guns will be 14 tons, 30 tons, and 51 tons, respectively, and the length of bore about 32 calibers.

The deliveries of the smaller forgings will begin within eighteen months from the date of contract, and the larger forging within from two and one-half to three years; all the forgings should be delivered within four years from the date of contract. The necessary contracts for the erection of the shops at Watervliet and procurement of tools and machinery would be promptly negotiated—as assurances are given that they will be—and the shops will be completed and in full working order within three years.

The work should begin on the 8-inch guns as soon as the first forgings are delivered. It is expected that the entire sixty-six guns enumerated will be completed within five years from the date of the first delivery of the forgings, or six and one-half years from the date of this act. No appropriation is made for the finishing and assembling of these guns at this time, as it is not needed during the present fiscal year. The amount that will be ultimately required for the finishing and assembling of these guns will be about $760,000. With the shops fully equipped and working to their full extent the output should be twelve 8-inch guns, seven 10-inch guns, and five 12-inch guns per annum. They will also admit of turning out, in addition, a limited quantity of field and siege guns.

Section 5. Under this section the Secretary of War is authorized to procure, under contract, a number of 12-inch breech-loading rifled mortars, cast-iron, hooped with steel, similar in construction and equal in power, accuracy, and endurance to the 12-inch experimental breech-loading, steel-hooped, rifled mortar now at the ordnance proving-ground. This experimental breech-loading mortar has been fired about two hundred rounds (a similar mortar, but muzzle-loading, has endured a test of four hundred rounds) and has given a range of about 6 miles, using a shell of 630 pounds weight. It is strong, works satisfactorily, and has given an accuracy of fire that promises no inferiority to the Krupp steel mortar when it shall be mounted upon a suitable platform and carriage.

As this mortar can be produced now in this country, and mortars are in great demand for coast defense, some seven hundred have been recommended for that purpose by the Fortification Board. It is believed that the procurement of a lot of fifty or more, which the amount appropriated in this section will provide, is a step in the right direction. The steel hoops and breech-mechanism forgings should be delivered within three years, during which time the cast-iron bodies could also be procured, and the mortars themselves should all be completed within five years from the date of contract.

Section 6 is drawn with a view of opening the field of gun construction to parties outside of the Government, to excite competition among the manufacturing establishments of the country to compete for this class of work, and thus result in the ultimate establishment of one or more gun establishments, independent of Government gun factories. Accordingly the section provides for the creation of a mixed board of civilians and army officers. There are three civilians and three officers, making a board of six members, with the provision inserted that no action shall be taken by the board except with the concurrence of at least five members thereof. This board has general authority to examine and make recommendations in regard to inventions and designs for heavy ordnance, carriages, platforms, protections, torpedoes, and other defensive appliances which may be submitted to it.

Provision is made in this section for the presentation of experimental guns and carriages, to be subjected to test as directed by the board; for the payment for such experimental guns and carriages, should they prove to be satisfactory; and the award of contracts for the procurement of a quantity of similar guns and carriages to the parties presenting them. The bill contemplates that breech-loading steel guns of 12, 14, and 16 inch calibers, cast-iron breech-loading guns of 12-inch caliber, and 12-inch breech-loading cast-iron mortars will be presented to the board for test; and sufficient provision is made in the appropriation for the payment for at least two such types of each gun, mortar, and carriage, if successful, except for the 12-inch steel guns, for which sufficient is given to pay for five test guns; but the contracts are to be awarded only to the party presenting the best of such guns or carriages.

It is required that the experimental guns shall equal in accuracy of fire, endurance, and power the best existing guns of a like caliber of whatever material made; that the 12-inch cast-iron mortar shall equal in the same respects the 12-inch breech-loading steel-hooped mortar now at the proving-ground at Sandy Hook. Subject to these conditions, the bill provides that the Secretary of War shall contract, at a price reasonable in the opinion of the board, for the following guns, namely:

For not less than fifty 12-inch breech-loading steel guns.
For not less than twenty 14-inch breech-loading steel guns.
For not less than twenty 16-inch breech-loading steel guns.
For not less than thirty 12-inch breech-loading cast-iron guns.

For not less than fifty 12-inch breech-loading cast-iron mortars, with carriages to correspond; subject to the proviso, that the carriages contracted for shall not exceed in number the guns and mortars that at the time of the contract have been contracted for.

The estimated money value of these contracts may reach to $13,255,438, which is proportioned as follows:

For the purchase of steel guns	$8,804,980
For the purchase of 12-inch cast-iron guns	750,000
For the purchase of 12-inch cast-iron mortars	300,000
For the gun-carriages	3,446,457
For the mortar-carriages	350,000

It is estimated that in order to complete and test the experimental guns and mortars named in the bill the time required will be approximately as follows:

For the 12-inch cast-iron mortars, sixteen months.
For the 12-inch cast-iron guns, twenty months.
For the 12-inch steel guns, four years.
For the 14-inch steel guns, four and one-half years.
For the 16-inch guns, five years.
The carriages to be tested with the guns.

And that fifty 12-inch cast-iron mortars can be completed ready for delivery in three years, thirty 12-inch cast-iron rifles in nine years, fifty 12-inch steel guns in ten years, twenty 14-inch steel guns in eleven years, and twenty 16-inch steel guns within thirteen years from the date of the act.

The prospective expenditures under the contracts to be made will be distributed approximately as follows:

Between the date of the act and June 30, 1892	$1,165,000
Between June 30, 1892, and June 30, 1895	600,000
Between June 30, 1895, and June 30, 1898	7,500,000
Between June 30, 1898, and June 30, 1901	4,000,000

Or the guns and carriages may all be completed and delivered in about thirteen years from this date. These estimates are based upon the representations of the manufacturers of cast-iron guns, and on the supposition that the producers of steel guns will provide facilities for manufacture at least equal to those proposed for the Government by the Gun Foundry Board.

A sum of $1,937,670 has been allotted for expenses attending the transportation, test, and purchase of the successful test guns, mortars, and carriages. And an additional sum of $500,000 to enable the board to make all needful and proper investigations, experiments, and tests to ascertain, with a view to their utilization by the Government, the most effective guns, projectiles, fuzes, torpedoes, armor plates, multicharge guns, etc., and methods of conversion of Parrott guns, and to make such further test of the 12-inch breech-loading cast-iron rifle now at Sandy Hook as they may deem desirable, and for other general experimental purposes.

The expenses of the board are limited to $20,000 per annum. These three items for test, experiments, and expenses of board amount to $2,477,670, which is the sum appropriated by the bill for the purposes of the board; it is made available for six years, the same period as named in the bill during which the board shall continue. Provision is made in this section that the Government shall not thereby be involved in an expenditure in any one fiscal year in excess of $2,500,000. The board is required to make annual report of its operations to the President of the United States for transmission to Congress, and must submit estimates of appropriations necessary to carry out contracts authorized in the bill, together with an itemized statement of expenditures.

The following letters from the Chief of Ordnance contain information concerning the Watervliet arsenal and the guns now under fabrication by the War Department:

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your letter dated April 30, 1888, requesting items of information in regard to six guns and one mortar under fabrication by the Ordnance Department, I have the honor to submit the following, namely (naming the guns in the order given upon the printed slip "Section 5," inclosed with your letter):

1. One 10-inch breech-loading steel gun, wire-wrapped, with longitudinal bars, on Woodbridge plan:
   Cost to date $15,000
   Estimated additional cost to complete 20,000
   Estimated time required to complete, eighteen months.
2. One 10-inch breech-loading steel-hooped gun:
   Cost to date $26,395
   Estimated additional cost to complete 7,500
   Estimated time required to complete, ten months.
3. One 10-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, wire-wrapped:
   Cost to date $24,000
   Estimated additional cost to complete 1,500
   Estimated time required to complete, three and a half months.
4. One 8-inch breech-loading steel-hooped gun:
   Cost to date $18,885
   Estimated additional cost to complete 5,000
   Estimated time required to complete, eight months.
5. One 12-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, steel-tubed:
   Cost to date $29,230
   Additional cost to complete 10,000
   Estimated time required to complete, three months.

The $10,000 required to complete this gun is covered by contract with the South Boston Iron Works, extended by urgent deficiency bill approved March 30, 1888. No further appropriation is needed for completing the gun.

6. One 12-inch breech-loading rifle, cast-iron, hooped, and tubed with steel, on the French system:
   Gun completed, cost $49,568

This gun has been accepted and paid for under contract with the South Boston Iron Works, extended by urgent deficiency bill approved March 30, 1888.

7. One 12-inch breech-loading mortar, cast-iron, hooped with steel:
   Mortar completed, cost $13,466

In regard to carriages for these guns, the Department has on hand several of old type, or such as have been constructed for proof purposes, and the test or proof-firing of all the guns can be made without purchasing additional carriages for that purpose. In order, however, to test improved types of carriages, a matter which the Department has been compelled to postpone in recent years owing to lack of appropriations, the following estimates for carriages to be purchased for use in connection with the proof of these guns are herewith submitted, namely:

8. For one 10-inch hydro-pneumatic disappearing gun-carriage	$20,000
For one gun-carriage shield	8,000
For foundations for carriage	3,000
9. For one 10-inch hydraulic barbette gun-carriage	15,000
For foundations for carriage	2,500
10. For one 12-inch hydro-pneumatic mortar-carriage	9,000
For foundations for carriage	2,500

From the preceding it will be seen that the four guns first named are not yet completed, whilst for the two remaining guns and one 12-inch rifled mortar one of the guns and the mortar are completed, and the money is available for the completion of the other gun.

A summary of all the items gives:

Cost of six guns and one mortar to date, being the total amount expended or covered by outstanding contract	$186,564
The estimates submitted for appropriations to be made are:
Estimated additional cost required to complete four unfinished guns	34,000
Estimated aggregate amount required for firing test of six guns and one mortar, as itemized upon the printed slip "Section 5," inclosed with the committee's letter dated April 30, 1888	124,000
Estimated cost of three carriages of improved type (items 8, 9, and 10) with foundations, etc.	60,000

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. S. SMITH,
Capt., Ord. Dept. U. S. Army, Acting Chief of Ordnance.

The CHAIRMAN SUBCOMMITTEE ON FORTIFICATION BILL,
Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., July 25, 1888.

SIR: In response to your letter of this date, I inclose a sketch of the Watervliet arsenal, showing its location, site of buildings, etc.

The extent of the arsenal grounds is 105 acres, valued at $150,000.

The inventory value of all the buildings, motive power, and shop fixtures therein, is $832,287.

The workshops consist of, namely: Workshop, two stories, 282 feet by 51 feet; workshop, two stories, 654 feet by 54 feet; blacksmith-shop and brass foundry, one story, 222 feet by 47½ feet; and these are used for the manufacture of artillery carriages, artillery harness, infantry and cavalry equipments.

There are also store-houses and magazines for the storage and issue of the above manufactures and powder and niter.

The average annual disbursements at this arsenal during the past twelve years has been about $125,000 per year.

One of the large lumber store-houses, a two-story brick building, 392 feet by 50 feet, which cost $19,860, has been converted into a gun-shop, and a shrinking-pit dug in it, all at an expense of about $20,000, and in it has been concentrated all the available gun machinery from the other arsenals—about $50,000 worth—many of them more or less worn.

Watervliet arsenal was established in 1816, and has continued to be one of our most important arsenals for manufacture, storage, and issue.

The present capacity of this shop for building guns is about fifty field-guns, one 8-inch and one 10-inch gun per annum.

It is practicable to build a 12-inch gun in this shop nearly within a year in place of the 10-inch. There are now being fabricated at Watervliet arsenal the following guns, namely: Twenty-five field-guns, one 8-inch and one 10-inch built-up steel gun. This arsenal was selected by the Gun Foundry Board as the most suitable of all the Government arsenals for the establishment of a gun factory, in respect to its location, extent of ground, fine building sites for gun-shops, security from hostile operations, and facilities for transportation of freight of all kinds both by water and rail.

The main shop buildings in use for the work done at the arsenal prior to the establishment of the gun-shop there in 1887 are all located below the canal, and are unsuited both in position and character for alteration or use as a part of the gun factory. Careful examination in this respect was made both by the Gun Foundry Board and by a board of ordnance officers appointed in 1887 to make recommendation in regard to plans for the alteration of the brick timber-shed for the present gun-shop, which is located on high ground, with good rock foundations, and contiguous to the ground selected by the Gun Foundry Board as a site for the proposed gun factory.

The inclosed map shows five sets of officers' quarters, namely:

Commanding officer's quarters.

Post surgeon's quarters, and quarters for three assistants, one of whom is post quartermaster and post commissary.

In the Book of Estimates, page 176, is an item for two sets of officers' quarters, not to exceed $10,000 each. These quarters are necessary now under existing circumstances, in order that more officers may be stationed there and placed on the work now going on, and in the event of a large appropriation being made these quarters will be an absolute necessity, otherwise the officers will have to live outside the arsenal and receive commutation of quarters; a proceeding undesirable in every respect and not for the interest of the Government.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. V. BENÉT.
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
House of Representatives.

Concluding, Mr. Chairman, the bill emanating from the Committee on Appropriations not only properly cares for the Government works, but it also calls upon the manufacturers of the country and says to them if they will produce and deliver guns acceptable in every respect and equal to the best in the known world, the Government will, after they have been fully and satisfactorily tested, accept their productions, and will pay for them, but the Government can not and will not take any risk.

Under the plan which is advised by the Committee upon Military Affairs, the Government will manufacture its own guns, and of course will take all risk as to defects, accidents, and failure of good results. Which is the better policy Congress must decide. For myself I have no hesitancy in expressing the opinion that it will be the part of wisdom to adopt the course recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I did not expect that this debate would come on at this time and I am not prepared to submit any lengthy remarks; but I think the committee ought to face the situation just as it presents itself to them to-day. We have before us the Army appropriation bill with certain Senate amendments attached. The question of order which might have been raised here, as to whether they would have been germane when the bill was pending in the House and upon its passage, has nothing whatever to do with the present situation. They are here and are either to be concurred in or non-concurred in, one or the other, and we have to face that question. We can not dictate to the Senate as to what amendments they shall put upon our appropriation bills, and when their amendments come here all we have to do is either to concur or non-concur in them.

What is the situation that we find before us here? I have in my hand a report from the Committee on Appropriations submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], made, I think, on July 26, and I find that one of the first sentences is this:

No appropriation has been made for fortifications and the armament thereof during the past two fiscal years.

We all have a very distinct and vivid recollection of the fact——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Before my friend passes to the consideration of the merits or demerits of the Senate amendments I would like to hear him on these two propositions: first, as to the right of the Senate to attach an amendment to an appropriation bill which is at war with the provisions of the rules of the House; and, second, if they have done so in this case, what is the proper proceeding for the House to pursue to enforce its rules and maintain its dignity?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I will reply briefly; I do not think either House can control the other. I remember distinctly in the Forty-seventh Congress, of which my friend from Ohio was a member, that the Senate took a little internal-revenue bill and attached to it a measure providing for the revision of the entire tariff schedules of the Government. The House passed it and my friend from Ohio voted for it. They do such things very frequently; and yet the Constitution remits all matters relating to the revenue—all bills for raising revenue—to the House of Representatives, and the rules of the House place them in the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think, however, that is not a parallel case. There was no rule of the House which prevented such an amendment in the House.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If my friend will permit me, I do not think it will be profitable to discuss at any considerable length the question of comity between the two Houses, or what the Senate has done or ought to do with our bills. The only question presented is what we shall do with the pending measure. The bill is here with the amendments, and we must deal with those amendments as a part of the bill. There is, as I before said, but one of two things to be done, that is to concur or non-concur in these amendments.

But let me finish the quotation from the report of the gentleman from Texas:

The fortifications appropriation act for the fiscal year 1886, which was the last one passed, appropriated $725,000.

So that two years ago we had $725,000 for fortifications and armament, and since then nothing. This Congress assembled on the 5th day of December, I believe, and they sat here until the 26th day of July, and not a single word was heard from the Committee on Appropriations or the Subcommittee on Fortifications in regard to an appropriation for armament or for fortifications. Meanwhile an appropriation bill for the Army was passed by the House and went to the Senate; and they, looking over the field and seeing that the committee of the House, which is clothed with privilege, had done absolutely nothing, and that the only possible chance to secure anything in the way of armament, steel, or plant, was to do just what they did, they took the bill of the House, or the substance of the bill, which had been favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs unanimously, as stated by the gentleman from Texas, and put it on the Army bill and sent it back here. That was done; the substance of that bill is attached to the Army bill, and is now before the House for consideration. On the very day that the Army appropriation bill with Senate amendments was returned and submitted by the Speaker the gentleman from Texas made haste to vindicate his jurisdiction over the subject-matter by reporting a fortification bill after the Senate had put the amendments upon this House bill. Now, the gentleman from Texas knows perfectly well from the history of past fortification bills in the House and Senate that it is an utter and absolute impossibility for that bill of his to become a law at this session of Congress. But if we are to have anything, whatever it is, in the nature of provision for armament, whether we should have field batteries or fortifications, we shall have to get it on this bill and by this very conference.

The bill reported by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] is a lengthy bill, a complex bill. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has said, it not only carries every provision that the Senate has attached to this bill, but many besides. For instance, here is a contingent appropriation, as he states in his report, providing for $13,255,438 to be expended if certain tests and experiments prove satisfactory; to be made under the direction of a board to be composed of three civilians and three Army officers or persons in public service, and this board is to continue for a period of six years. And there is to be an appropriation of $20,000 a year for the pay and expenses of this board. The amendments of the Senate make no provision for these experiments except in the matter of projectiles and a few things of that kind. The thirty-third amendment is also substantially and almost verbatim a section in the bill reported by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]. Then the complaint of the gentleman from Texas is not simply because the Senate provides for a gun-factory, or guns and gun-steel; not that these are not proper subjects of appropriation, not that they are not right, not that this House ought not to make such appropriations, but simply a question of form instead of substance; in other words, the whole contention is merely a matter of jurisdiction of the committee.

Now, I submit to the candor and consideration of this House whether, when we have been two full years without an appropriation, and when, almost seven months after the Committee on Appropriations was constituted, we see for the first time a fortification bill in this House, and we have an opportunity possibly by conference with the Senate to secure what all admit is needed, whether or not we shall reject that opportunity and postpone this important and necessary legislation for another year simply because it comes from the Military Committee, or rather because it comes in the form of Senate amendments upon the House bill. The chairman of the Military Committee has said that "we do not ask concurrence upon the part of the House; we only ask formal non-concurrence in order that this bill may go to the conference committee, and that there, after a full and free conference, we may decide upon the best thing to do."

Now, what do the Senate amendments propose? They are brief; they are explicit; they are easily understood; they are not ambiguous. In the first place, the Senate amendments propose to create an Army gun factory. We have now a Navy gun factory, but the Navy gun factory can not make guns for both Army and Navy. The beginning of this Army gun factory is already organized at Watervliet, in New York. This question of location has been submitted to various boards. The Gun-Foundry Board has reported in favor of Watervliet. The Flagler board has reported in favor of Watervliet. The War Department has concurred in these reports, and has moved all its gun machinery there, and that is why I think we ought to adopt it. But we are asked to non-concur in this legislation here simply because it comes from the Senate instead of from the Fortifications Committee of this House.

But there is also in the gentleman's bill the same provision for this same gun factory at Watervliet. The next provision of the Senate amendment, which is amendment 33, is for the manufacture or purchase and testing of cannon and carriages.

Now, I submit that the armament of the Army is a matter for the Military Committee.

The armament of the artillery of the Army is just as much a matter for the Military Committee as the armament of the infantry or cavalry. It makes no sort of difference whether the armament be of light field batteries or the armament of heavy batteries, it is part of the Army. The Army must operate the heavy batteries as well as light batteries. The Army must garrison the fortifications where the heavy guns would be placed, and these guns are a parcel of the armament of the Army.

What is the next provision? Having provided for the erection of an Army gun factory it then provides for the material with which to operate the gun factory. It provides for the purchase of a certain amount of gun steel. The bill of the gentleman from Texas does the same; the only difference is the amount.

Now, upon this the Military Committee report in favor of $5,000,000 worth of gun-steel, and his committee favors $1,500,000 worth of gun-steel. The object of the larger amount is simply this: to make the contract large enough to induce private parties or corporations to create the necessary plant to produce gun-steel for heavy guns. If you authorize the purchase of only $1,500,000 worth there is no such inducement. No institution can afford to create a plant sufficient to make steel for 8, 10, or 12 inch guns for a contract of a million and a half. There is to-day one institution, and only one, that can create these forgings for the 8-inch guns. That is the Bethlehem Steel Works in Pennsylvania; and to authorize a purchase of a million and a half is to give the contract to them, because there is nobody to compete with them. Instead of inviting competition as the gentleman desires, it is absolutely destroying competition by giving the contract to the only institution prepared to take it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I suppose that in the preparation of this bill the gentlemen of the Military Committee conferred with the officers of the Ordnance Corps?

Mr. CUTCHEON. We did.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not know what testimony they gave to you, but they assured us that $1,500,000 for the purchase of steel was ample and more than they could use, and if an appropriation is to be made for four or five million dollars' worth of steel, after they have told us that $1,500,000 is ample, there must be some reason for it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the House bill in its present form was draughted in the Ordnance Office by the Chief of Ordnance. We sent up to him House bill 1555, which was the bill originally introduced by myself, and we received back from the Ordnance Office House bill 8465, which, without the change of a word or any change except the transposition of a section, was the bill reported.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is proper I should say to my honorable friend, if he deems it no interruption, that the soul of the Ordnance Office, its aggressive energy and ability, was before our committee, and I appeal to my colleagues here whether I am not correct in the statement that he assured us that $1,500,000 was ample.

Mr. SAYERS. He said that it was an abundance, and that it would last them for six years.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understand perfectly that $1,500,000 is sufficient for all the steel that can be worked within the ensuing year; but I do maintain that when we have before us a general plan of fortifications reported by the fortifications board it is wise economy that in inviting proposals, the very object of which is to create private plants, and numerous private plants, which may compete with each other, we should offer contracts large enough to induce the creation of such plants.

Mr. SAYERS. Captain Smith, of the Ordnance Bureau, says that all the steel he can possibly consume for one year in the present condition of the Watervliet arsenal is $200,000 worth.

Mr. GEAR. In the present condition of the arsenal.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir. And he further says that it will take him at least four years to expend the $750,000 in improving the appliances at Watervliet to manufacture 8-inch, 10-inch, and 12-inch guns.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Now, Mr. Chairman, we do not want any scarecrows here. Let us look at the provision as it stands in the Senate amendment. It reads:

> For the purchase of rough-finished, oil-tempered, and annealed steel for high-power coast-defense guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch caliber, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection at each stage of the manufacture, and including all the parts of each caliber, $5,000,000: Provided, That no money shall be expended except for steel accepted and delivered.

Before the steel can be accepted it must be created. Before the forgings can be created the plant must be established. This money will not be paid out this year. A good deal of it will not be paid out next year, nor the year after, but the Secretary of War ought to have authority to offer a contract sufficiently large to induce these companies to create a plant sufficient to produce the steel. It is required that the steel shall begin to be delivered, the small forgings in eighteen months and the large forgings in three years. This steel will not be delivered until three, four, or five years from this time, but we want to put a sufficient appropriation under the control of the Secretary of War to enable him to give out proper contracts. Contracts that shall encourage and induce competition, and eventually cheapen the cost to the Government.

Mr. RYAN. Have we not got plants that will make 12-inch guns now?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I think not. They can make 6 and 8 inch guns but not 10 and 12 inch guns. I believe that the Bethlehem Works are preparing to make heavier forgings.

Mr. RYAN. Is not this limited to 12-inch guns?

Mr. CUTCHEON. No; it provides for 8-inch, 10-inch, and 12-inch guns. We have three establishments that can produce 6-inch guns, one that can produce 8 and 10 inch guns, and none that can make 12-inch guns at the present time.

Mr. RYAN. Have not the Department got a contract out now for 12-inch guns?

Mr. BURNES. They have.

Mr. RYAN. Then we must have a plant that can supply those guns.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Not at present; but they take the contract and then prepare themselves to do the work. Section 5 provides that the material for the guns provided for in section 4 shall be purchased in accordance with section 3709, Revised Statutes, for which purpose the Secretary of War is authorized to make contracts with responsible steel manufacturers, after proper advertisement, continuing not less than thirty days, in the newspapers most likely to reach the said manufacturers. It simply provides for the manner of making the purchases, the same as the bill of the gentleman from Texas does.

Section 6 provides for the purchase of submarine mines. Section 7 provides for the purchase of submarine torpedoes, etc. Now I desire to say that there is not a single provision in the Senate amendments that is not in the bill of the gentleman from Texas, except simply as to the amount of steel. The gentleman therefore admits the propriety of this legislation. He is in favor of the legislation, and he knows that he can have it now to a certainty; and yet, upon a mere punctilio, upon a mere point of parliamentary etiquette, he would reject the Senate amendment and thereby destroy the possibility of this legislation at the present session of Congress; because, Mr. Chairman, unless we accept this opportunity, even if the gentleman should get a chance to bring up his bill hereafter and send it to the Senate, it would not reach them until they were in the very midst of the discussion of the tariff bill, and when they get through with that, if they ever get through with it, they will want to go home.

He knows perfectly well what the fate of this bill was in the Forty-ninth Congress; that in the first session it went to conference and staid in conference during the recess; that the two Houses of Congress continued the conference through the entire second session, and that the bill died in conference at the end of the Forty-ninth Congress.

If this is right legislation, as the gentleman admits by reporting such legislation himself—and I have his report in my hand—if it is legislation which the country needs, if the Senate has sent it to us in such a form that we can now secure this legislation, then, although the Committee on Military Affairs has instructed its chairman to report in favor of non-concurrence in all these amendments in order that we might have at once a full and free conference with the Senate, I am here as one member of that committee to say that I do hope the amendments will prevail, that they will be finally concurred in and become a part of the legislation of this country.

While I shall vote with my committee in favor of non-concurrence, yet if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], when the proper time comes, shall endeavor to secure instructions to the committee of conference in regard to their action, I shall oppose with whatever ability I may have all such instructions. I want to see a committee of three gentlemen of the House and three gentlemen of the Senate sit down and consider this bill in view of its provisions, in view of the history of past legislation, in view of the necessities of the country, and, untrammeled, do that which to them may seem wisest and best to be done.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the frank manner in which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] has met this issue relieves me of some little difficulty I might have had in expressing my own conceptions of the situation. The gentleman has told us that the Senate of the United States, in view of the past struggles to obtain appropriations for coast defenses, cast their eyes in the direction of the House to speculate as to what might be accomplished here, and found that two bills had been introduced and referred to the Military Committee of this House; that these bills contained very important provisions for coast fortifications which were acceptable to them, and so they selected the Army appropriation bill upon which to place this amendment. They calculated that their best way to operate upon this House was to take away from the Committee on Appropriations a subject which had been committed to it by the House under its rules, and to give the subject to a committee which, under our rules, has no jurisdiction of it; because, considering the action of individual members, they believed that by this method they could reach a result satisfactory to themselves.

I believe the gentleman from Michigan has stated the matter frankly;

I believe this is just what the Senate mean—that they distrust the Committee on Appropriations of this House and did not intend to put this amendment on the fortification bill, because they did not believe they could do anything in this matter with the Committee on Appropriations. And they had some reason for that opinion. Similar provisions to this were placed upon the fortification bill in the last Congress by the Senate. This House entertained ideas on this subject entirely different from those of the Senate. The Senate was persistent in presenting its views. The two Houses could not agree on a plan; they disagreed; and the fortification bill failed. And no great city was destroyed; no harm has come to the country; it is a bill that may fail without creating apprehension in the mind of anybody anywhere throughout the land. I say, therefore, that the Senate reasoned perhaps well when they said, "We have tried the Appropriations Committee of the House, which is the true representative of the House on this class of questions, and we will now go to some other committee; we will go to the Military Committee, which entertains different views; and putting this amendment on the Army appropriation bill we shall get into conference with a class of gentlemen who are not averse to our views on this subject."

Now, what is the proper response on the part of this House? You have in your rules declared specifically that questions relating to fortifications shall go to the Committee on Appropriations for consideration and recommendation to the House. You have established modes of procedure which have been sanctioned from the beginning of this Government and sanctioned by parliamentary bodies amongst all the intelligent nations of the earth. You have divided your work among various committees who are to advise you upon the subject of legislation. You are now told—and I believe truly told—by the gentleman from Michigan that the Senate, because it does not like the Committee on Appropriations which this House, through its Speaker, has seen fit to select, because it does not like the rules which this House has seen fit to prescribe in relation to matters of this kind; because it does not like the results which have come from our system of doing business, is going to endeavor to call forth by this legislation upon the Army appropriation bill a conference committee to which this subject is not regularly intrusted by the House.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], in discussing this question, read from Rule XI to show the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs. When I called his attention to the fact that the subject of fortifications was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and asked him how in the light of the language of the rule he could maintain that appropriations for fortifications could go properly to his committee, he answered me by saying that he was addressing himself to the argument of the gentleman from Texas. And the only answer I ever got from the gentleman on this subject after that, on rereading that language, was the remark that no intelligent man could doubt that the Committee on Military Affairs had jurisdiction of this subject of fortifications.

Yet the gentleman from Illinois was, I believe, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and was on the conference committee on the fortification bill which made this issue with the Senate in the last House. The gentleman certainly was intelligent then. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole, as has been shown by the proceedings read to the House, has ruled in opposition to the view of the gentleman. His view has been controverted by various gentlemen in this House on many occasions. Therefore, he does not meet this question by any such answer.

The proper means of ascertaining the meaning of "appropriation for fortifications" is by going to your fortification bills and seeing what subjects have been embraced in those bills. You will find that the Committee on Appropriations in such bills has uniformly reported provisions for this class of fortifications, and this has been done without any question. Thus you have the conclusion of the House of Representatives as to what a fortification bill is.

There can therefore be no question in my mind, Mr. Chairman, that if this proposition were reported to this House on the Army appropriation bill by the Committee on Military Affairs, you would again rule, as you have ruled in the past, that it is not germane to the bill.

Now, sir, I ask if something is not due from that high body at the other end of the Capitol to this, the other branch of the legislative body assembled here, the representatives of the American people? I ask if it is worthy of that body to attempt to do what the gentleman from Michigan has said was their purpose? I ask if it is worthy of this House to submit to it? I ask if this House, and especially gentlemen on this side of the House, are willing to justify their claim to such domination by the precedent cited by the gentleman from Michigan, to wit: the action of the Senate in taking a little internal-revenue bill of the House, attaching as an amendment a tariff bill to it, and thus taking jurisdiction of the whole subject of the tariff, and passing a bill as an alleged amendment to the other? Are gentlemen on this side of the House willing to conform to that precedent? Are they willing to sanction it?

I apprehend, sir, that there is no man on this side of the aisle who would indorse that action; and the same purpose is evidenced here. It is to take the jurisdiction from the persons to whom the House has committed it, to take the jurisdiction from the persons whom you have authorized to make recommendations for you, and to give it to others having no jurisdiction of the question.

I have nothing to do with the merits or demerits of the question. I do not undertake to set up my opinions against those of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and his associates on that committee, as to the merits or demerits of these amendments. Nor will I undertake to question the wisdom of the Committee on Appropriations in reporting their bill, many of whom have for years made it a specialty to study the necessities of the Government in reference to fortifications. I will not obtrude upon this Committee of the Whole my opinions of the merits of the measure in any shape. But, sir, being forewarned as to the purpose contemplated, I am unwilling that that purpose shall be sanctioned by my vote.

The gentleman from Illinois, when I first asked him as to the inclination of his mind on this subject, and referred to this question of non-concurrence in the amendments, and sought to probe him further to ascertain whether he was in favor of engrafting that sort of legislation on the bill, answered, "Why, I am in accord with the gentleman from Georgia." And yet it appeared thereafter, and the gentleman declares that it is the will of the House and the will of the country, that the measure which his committee has reported is demanded, and that they are endeavoring to "conform to that will." Who gave to the gentleman the authority to ascertain the will of this side of the House, or the will of the people of the country upon the subject? So far as I know, sir, there are no gentlemen in this House, and no body of its members authorized by it, except the Committee on Appropriations, to indicate to this House what is proper to be done; and I would rather take the opinion of that committee as to the will of the people than that of the gentleman from Illinois, as I believe they are more familiar with the opinions of the country, and that their action is more likely to be in accord with the sentiment of the people than the action of any other person or persons acting upon a measure which is properly within the jurisdiction of that committee alone.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to my friend from Illinois, I want him to understand, and his committee, that my action in this matter, and the observations I have seen fit to indulge in, have no relation at all to the capacity of those gentlemen, or reflect in any manner upon their high character. I accepted with pleasure the assignment made in the organization of the House of the gentlemen of that committee, as I did with reference to the Committee on Appropriations. But, sir, if there is any question upon which this House should be careful, it is in the matter of public expenditures. It has been regarded, so far as my observations are concerned, as highly important that there should be chosen by the House some of its most gifted members, some of its most careful members for the Committee on Appropriations, because the matter of the expenditure of the public money involves the matter of taxation, and the matter of taxation involves the highest questions of which a legislative body can possibly have cognizance.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, therefore, that before this bill shall be intrusted to a conference, that the House will see to it that the conferees, whoever they may be, are instructed to inform the Senate that they never will submit to the claims suggested by the gentleman from Michigan. Sir, I am anxious to see this Army bill pass; but I am anxious to stand beside the rights of this House, and I would rather see it fail a thousand-fold than see the Senate dominate this body. [Applause.] And for one, sir, I say I am ready to join hands with other gentlemen and declare that I will resort to any parliamentary tactics to prevent this outrage upon this House. It is not technical opposition. It is wise. It is in conformity to our rules that have been established to prevent error, and to present the wisest counsel to the House. It is no party question. It belongs to this House, and for one, sir, I am prepared to insist that we conform to the rules that we have seen fit to adopt.

One word more, Mr. Chairman. It may be argued that this point of order does not apply in the Senate. That is not the question I raised. I have seen legislation not at all in harmony with the bill to which it was attached put on various bills of this House, and it seems to me—I will not charge it because it is not parliamentary—but it does seem to me that on many occasions the Senate of the United States has willfully passed aside appropriation bills to put their amendments on other bills for purposes similar to that indicated by the gentleman from Michigan. Therefore I want it to be understood that we will not be controlled by the Senate. I am glad that this question has been presented as the gentleman from Michigan has presented it. He has done it truthfully and boldly, and it is just the same as the question came before the House when the tariff bill of 1883 was put on a little internal-revenue bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I intended to resume the floor for the purpose of closing debate, but I believe the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] desires to be recognized, and I yield the floor to him.

Mr. REED. I am very glad to hear from the gentleman from Georgia that this is not a party question; and I should be very much astonished if the House of Representatives undertook to assume the position which he assumes on this question. The Senate of the United States is an independent body. The House of Representatives is also an independent body. Each one of them under the Constitution has the right, the permanent right, to make rules for its guidance, but neither one of them has any right to make rules for the guidance of the other.

A proposition so fundamental as that I never expected to see disputed by a gentleman of the character and standing of the gentleman from Georgia. Nor did I expect to hear him argue the proposition he has presented. His proposition, in a word, is this: That because the rules of this body distribute certain bills to certain committees therefore the Senate must conform to the House rules in the amendment of these bills. Did any man ever hear that right contended for in this way before? How can this House insist that the Senate shall conform to its rules? By parity of reasoning the Senate rules would also envelop the House, and we should find ourselves covered by rules not made, according to the Constitution, by the body controlled by them, but by another body separate and independent. Can language add anything to the absurdity of such a position as that? We have the right to amend Senate bills according to our will and pleasure, and no man on earth would resent an attack upon our right thus broadly stated more quickly than the gentleman from Georgia. We could not live under such a regulation for an instant. We have the right to amend any Senate bill to the full extent of our wisdom and judgment.

If we choose to control that judgment by certain rules that is an expression of our will and nothing else. We can not control the other body by our rules any more than it can control us, and is the House to be allowed to be betrayed into a position in conflict not merely with the Senate of the United States, for we could stand that, but with common sense, which we can not stand? How is it possible to answer that idea? How is it possible for gentlemen to do by indirection what they can not do by direction? Can this House say to the Senate, "We will not pass these amendments of yours even if we agreed to them with our judgments, because you have violated our rights by amending a bill which you had a perfect right to amend, and we are determined to limit your right of amendment to such an extent that you must amend in accordance with the rules we have set up in this House?"

Just think of it; just think of the position this House would be in on a question of this sort raised on an appropriation bill as important as that which carries the expenses of the Army of the United States. No conference committee could stand upon it. No sensible man in this House could look a United States Senator in the face and make any such kind of talk. Gentlemen may do so here. They may lash themselves into a state of fury about this matter and talk about breasting the Senate. Why, you can not breast anybody on that. No man can for an instant sustain himself in a controversy with a man who is half-way intelligent upon any such ground as that. The House of Representatives is an independent body. The Senate of the United States is equally independent, and we are undertaking to fetter them in their amendments to our bills, a thing which everybody knows is not within our power. Such a course is not reasonable. It will not be pretended that it is reasonable, nor will the House upon a pretense of that kind permit itself to be put in such an absurd position as that.

To come now to the merits; let us here consider what is here presented to us. We have a great country with an immense extent of seacoast. It is true that there is not one chance in a hundred of war, there is not one chance, perhaps, in a thousand for war, and yet if we should ever have war there awaits us, unless we are better prepared than we are to-day, a national humiliation more terrible than was ever inflicted upon any nation on the face of the earth.

Modern guns we have not kept up with. Exhausted and wearied by our long war, we threw aside all improvements in gunnery and allowed ourselves to drift away behind the rest of the world—we who at the close of the war were the foremost military nation under the sun. Now, while we are in that condition, what is the state of affairs on the other side of the water? Nay, what is the condition in South America among those little states? Why, they have great guns capable of throwing with accuracy—I hardly dare to state how far, but more than half a dozen miles.

We have not a gun to-day in this country that can compete with guns that can be sent over here in ten days from the coast of England—not a gun. Their ships could lie outside of the farthest range of any gun that we have, and could lay every city upon our Atlantic and Pacific coasts under tribute. That would be not only a pecuniary loss, but it would be a weightier loss than that; it would be an utter disgrace to us. What are we to do then? Are these guns to be built in an instant? Can we do as nations used to do, prepare ourselves for war after the declaration of war? Every man here knows that we can not. In from ten to twenty days after a declaration of war by any European power this country would be at the mercy of that power, and not a gun could be built to meet their 16-inch guns in, I venture to say, less than three years, and I should be inside of the truth if I said in less than five years.

There are two plans between which we have to choose. The first is to build the gun which is now known to be the best gun in the world, the built-up steel gun, which will carry a projectile the distance which the European guns can carry. The nature and power and capacity of that gun are as well known and ascertained as the power and capacity of the mogul type of railroad engine. The proposition on the one part is to build that kind of a gun in reasonable numbers, and $5,000,000 is unreasonable only because it is too small an amount for us to expend for that purpose.

The other proposition is—and it is a proposition which I have no special interest in—that we shall build some gun that is going to be invented to-morrow or next day. I say the plain dictate of common sense for a nation as wealthy as ours is to build the best gun that can be built to-day, because it will not become obsolete during its lifetime, even if better guns be invented; and then if there is any better gun that can be built to-morrow, let us build that, too. But let us attend to the business of to-day.

There is another matter behind this that we want to consider.

The building of these guns requires trained, skilled workmen, workmen not merely trained individually, but trained to work together. One of the strongest reasons why we have not built anything better than a 10-inch gun is that we have not had the necessary skilled and trained labor, and it takes a long time for men to learn how to do this work effectually. Let me give you an example. When the Bessemer Steel Works at Johnstown were set up the best they expected them to do was sixteen turns a day; but after training their workmen they managed to do forty-eight turns, I think, with the same workmen with whom they had expected to do only sixteen.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House, under its previous order, stands adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. BOOTHMAN: A bill (H. R. 11051) granting a pension to Wesley McTaylor—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BOUTELLE: A bill (H. R. 11052) granting a pension to Clara M. Owen—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FUNSTON: A bill (H. R. 11053) for the relief of Jay Lyndon Harrison—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11054) for the relief of Samuel J. Barnard—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAYES: A bill (H. R. 11055) granting a pension to Daniel Shrawder—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KETCHAM: A bill (H. R. 11056) granting a pension to Ann Maher—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. POST: A bill (H. R. 11057) granting a pension to Margaret Gray—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: A bill (H. R. 11058) for the relief of Charles C. Pickett—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. YODER: A bill (H. R. 11060) for the relief of John Amstutz, sr.—to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11061) erecting a monument at Fort Recovery, Mercer County, Ohio—to the Committee on the Library.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BANKHEAD: Petition of Isaac Hewitt, of Tuscaloosa County, and of Richard Files, administrator of Louisa C. Stevenson, of Walker County, Alabama, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ENLOE: Petition of E. F. Jones, of George W. Haughton, of B. E. Craven, and R. E. Carter, of Tennessee, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FORNEY: Papers in the claim of Asa Williamson, of Cleburne County, Alabama—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FUNSTON: Petition to place the name of Jay Lyman Harrison on the pension-roll—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOUK: Petition of Jacob Snider, and of Charles Schneider, of Knox County, Tennessee, for reference of their claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LAFFOON: Petition of citizens of Hopkins County, Kentucky, for amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, petition of citizens of Morton's Gap, Ky., in favor of House bill No. 8716—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. POST: Petition of Stephen S. Tripp, to pension Margaret Gray, mother of Wilson S. Gray, of Company G, Eleventh Illinois Cavalry—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: Petition of Heloise Hawkins, widow of Austin R. Hawkins, of Louisiana, for reference of her claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HENRY SMITH: Petition of G. Schnesitzer and 19 others, in favor of a general pension act—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. A. C. THOMPSON: Petition of citizens of Vesuvius, Lawrence County, Ohio, for amendment to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WILKINS: Petition of citizens of West Washington, D. C., relative to the Freedman's Savings Bank and Trust Company—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The following petition in favor of House bill 9716, for the better protection of free labor from convict labor, was received and referred to the Committee on Labor:

By Mr. CLARDY: Petition of 20 citizens of Pilot Knob, Mo.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 1, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

GROUNDS OF WALLACH SCHOOL LOT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication in response to a resolution offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR], which will be read.

The communication was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, July 31, 1888.

SIR: The commissioners of the District of Columbia have received a copy of a resolution passed by the Senate on the 28th of July instant, requesting them to inform the Senate whether "they contemplate diverting part of the grounds of the Wallach school lot to other than school purposes; and if so, by what authority, for what purpose, and the reasons therefor." In response the commissioners beg leave to say that they have had under consideration the selection of a site "for erecting an engine-house in the southeastern section of Washington," for which provision is made in the act of Congress approved July 18, 1888, entitled "An act making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889," etc., and among other properties adapted for the purpose in question have examined and considered the advantages offered by the Wallach school lot. No decision has been reached as yet by the commissioners with respect to the site referred to, and all questions involving their authority to use the Wallach school lot will be determined before any decision is reached touching that lot. It may be well to call attention to the fact that the engine-house in question must from the nature of the case, no provision being made for the purchase of a site, be erected upon the ground belonging to the District of Columbia.

Very respectfully,

W. B. WEBB, President.

Hon. JOHN J. INGALLS,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. It may be that there is some defect in the provision with reference to the construction of the proposed engine-house. Perhaps the proper provision has not been made for the purchase of a lot. I submit if that is the case, if the law is defective, the defect should be supplied rather than that the commissioners should go on and trespass upon those premises which have already by act of Congress and by provision of law been set apart for the necessary accommodation of the city of Washington.

It seems that the commissioners set about doing this without consulting Congress at all. If they can be allowed to locate fire-engine premises on the school lots of the city in one part of it they can everywhere, and trespasses of that kind, it seems to me, should not be entered upon without first obtaining authority from Congress so to do.

I have some private information that I was not in possession of when I offered the resolution. I am informed that parties interested, perhaps under the commissioners themselves, have circulated petitions in that neighborhood bringing some official pressure to bear upon the inhabitants there, upon parties who have hitherto been remonstrating with considerable vehemence, to secure their acquiescence in the location of this proposed engine-house upon one of the school lots of the city, a lot which ought to have been improved long since in accordance with the original provision with reference to it.

It is, however, a matter proper to go to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I feel very sure that in the care of that committee the school interests of the city will be properly secured.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of John Fitzpatrick, of Washington, D. C., praying to be granted certain relief; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Strafford, N. H., remonstrating against any change in the Bureau of Animal Industry as at present constituted, etc.; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Strafford, N. H., praying for the adoption of police regulations to prevent the manufacture and sale of adulterated articles and the use of misleading brands on food, medicines, and liquors for exportation from the country or from one State to another; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BECK presented a petition of citizens of Hardin County, Kentucky, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. MCPHERSON presented a memorial of James R. Haskell, of New York City, relative to armament of fortifications and the use of dynamite projectiles in multicharge guns; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2221) for the relief of Seth Wheeler, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to report favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 8191) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture and to create an executive department to be known as the Department of Agriculture.

The bill is now reported in precisely the same shape in which it has been heretofore reported. It was recommitted to the committee and the committee on consideration instruct me to report it back the same as before. It was printed when reported formerly, and it will not be necessary to again print it. I ask that the order to print be omitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar without printing.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice to the Senate that I shall at a very early day ask the Senate to consider the bill with a view to its passage.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 9672) granting a pension to Eliza A. Williamson;
A bill (H. R. 7717) granting a pension to Mrs. Catharine Reed;
A bill (H. R. 5232) granting a pension to Andrew Mucklin;
A bill (H. R. 9387) for the relief of Emanuel H. Custer;
A bill (H. R. 783) granting a pension to Mrs. Nancy E. Spencer;
A bill (H. R. 775) granting an increase of pension to John D. Jones;
A bill (H. R. 9792) to increase the pension of Charles S. Baker; and A bill (H. R. 2507) granting a pension to Russell L. Doane, of Peck, Salinac County, Michigan.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 508) to empower Robert Adger and others to bring suit in the Court of Claims for rent alleged to be due them, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5092) for the relief of Charles L. Bradwell, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1088) for the relief of Charles W. Denton, of Oregon, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3364) to provide for an American register for the steamer Saginaw, of New York, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. From the Committee on Interstate Commerce I report back the bill (S. 3187) making an appropriation of $150,000 to enable A. de Bausset to build an air-ship to convey passengers and freight through the air, and for other purposes, and at the request of the party interested ask to have it referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The report was agreed to.

COURTS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 7398) to subdivide the eastern judicial district of Louisiana, and to fix the time and place for holding terms of court therein.

This is the same as a Senate bill on the subject. The various bills of this class relating to different States were reported from the Committee on the Judiciary the other day, and the Senate passed them at the time they were reported. This bill was accidentally not included with the others, and if the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] should ask it I have no doubt the Senate would pass it at this time.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask the consent of the Senate that the bill be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the bill reported by the Senator from Massachusetts may be now considered. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that a Senate bill on the same subject had been passed.

Mr. HOAR. I will look into that. I do not think the bill has passed; but there is a Senate bill on the same subject, which should be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It should be indefinitely postponed to avoid confusion.

VENEZUELA STEAM TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

Mr. EVARTS. I report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs the joint resolution (S. R. 83) for the relief of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company with amendments and a written report. I also hand in the papers with the report.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to have the joint resolution read, if there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read at length as proposed to be amended, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears from the correspondence transmitted to the Senate by the message of the President of the 2d day of February, 1872, (Ex. Doc. No. 28, second session, Forty-eighth Congress), and on the 12th of April, 1888, (Ex. Doc. No. 143, first session, Fiftieth Congress), that since the year 1871, indemnity has been repeatedly demanded by the executive department of the United States from the Venezuelan Government, but without avail, for the wrongful seizure, detention, and employment in war and otherwise of the American steam-ships Hero, Nutrias, and San Fernando, the property of the Venezuelan Steam Transportation Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York, and a citizen of the United States, and the imprisonment of its officers, citizens of the United States, under circumstances that render the Republic of Venezuela justly responsible therefor; and

Whereas all the diplomatic efforts of the Government of the United States repeatedly exerted for an amicable adjustment and payment of the just indemnity due to said corporation and its officers, citizens of the United States, upon whose property and persons the aforesaid wrongs were inflicted, have proved entirely unavailing: Therefore,

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to take such measures as in his judgment may be necessary to promptly obtain indemnity from the Venezuelan Government for the injuries, losses, and damages suffered by the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company of New York, and its officers, by reason of the wrongful seizure, detention, and employment in war or otherwise of the said company's steamers Hero, San Fernando, and Nutrias by Venezuelan belligerants in the year 1871, and to secure this end he is authorized to employ such means or exercise such power as may be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. Did the Senator from New York ask for the printing of the accompanying documents?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He did not.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that they be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the accompanying papers be printed.

Mr. EVARTS. The whole mass?

Mr. MORGAN. The whole mass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

GUIANA AND VENEZUELA BOUNDARIES.

Mr. EVARTS. I offer a Senate resolution, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The President transmitted to the Senate on the 26th of July, 1888, papers that were called for regarding the dispute between the Government of Venezuela and the Government of Great Britain, concerning the boundaries between British Guiana and Venezuela. They have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The subject is still there. The resolution is to provide for the printing of the papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EVARTS. Unless it can be now acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the resolution be now read and considered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate —— copies of the message of the President transmitting report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying correspondence, relating to the pending dispute between the Government of Venezuela and the Government of Great Britain concerning the boundaries between British Guiana and Venezuela.

Mr. MANDERSON. Under the rule I presume the resolution will go to the Committee on Printing. Is there a request to have it now considered?

Mr. EVARTS. I ask that it may be considered now. The usual number is desired.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the usual number is to be printed a reference may be waived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerks will insert the proposed amendment. The Chair understands that the resolution refers to the documents which have already been ordered to be printed on motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. EVARTS. No, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a different affair entirely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment to the resolution will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the blank insert the words "the usual number of;" so as to read:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate the usual number of copies of the message of the President, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified, if there be no objection, and the question is upon agreeing to the same as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORT ON LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the Senate consider the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] authorizing the printing of Senate Report 1727 in relation to alcoholic liquors, etc., reported from the Committee on Printing with an amendment, and now on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That —— extra copies of Senate Report No. 1727, upon the "joint resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States in relation to the manufacture, importation, exportation, transportation, and sale of alcoholic liquors," be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to fill the blank with "5,000;" which was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3405) for the relief of Albert Grant; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3406) to establish the rank of Arza B. Gilson, of Havana, Ohio, as major of the One hundred and sixty-sixth Ohio Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3407) for the relief of J. F. Bailey & Co. and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 3408) to authorize the construction of a street railway and wagon-road over the Rio Grande between the city of El Paso, Tex., and Paso del Norte, Mexico; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DESERT-LAND APPLICATIONS.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish the Senate with a list of canceled desert-land applications, with the names of the applicants, and the amounts paid to the United States on such applications respectively, and to state whether, in his opinion, such applicants, or any of them, are equitably entitled to be reimbursed for the money paid on such applications to the United States, or any part thereof, and also to state what legislation is necessary to enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to settle with such applicants on equitable principles.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STEWART. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HARRIS. It had better be printed and go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and lie over under the rule.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT WINONA, MINN.

Mr. SABIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10604) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona, Minn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 6, line 36, after the word "as," to strike out "Congress" and insert "Secretary of War;" so as to read:

And the said structure shall be changed or removed, at the cost and expense of the owners thereof, from time to time, as the Secretary of War may direct, so as to preserve the free and convenient navigation of said river; and the authority to erect and continue said bridge shall be subject to revocation and modification by law when the public good shall, in the judgment of Congress or the Secretary of War, so require, without any expense or charge to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SABIN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. SAWYER, Mr. SABIN, and Mr. MCPHERSON were appointed.

BRAZOS RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. COKE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the table the bill (H. R. 10165) for improving the mouth of the Brazos River, Texas.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS NEAR DENVER.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9056) to protect purchasers of lands lying in the vicinity of Denver, Colo., heretofore withdrawn by the executive department of the Government as lying within the limits of certain railroad grants, and afterward held to lie without such limits.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

P. E. PARKER.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3038) for the relief of P. E. Parker.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, after the words "the sum of," to strike out $2,366.95 and insert $1,793.16; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to said P. E. Parker, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,793.16, in full compensation for the losses sustained in money on payment of said judgment.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to make a brief statement of the facts, which I think will satisfy my friend from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] and the Senate that the amendment ought not to be agreed to.

One Frank Travis was an internal-revenue collector, and as such collector he became a defaulter, and suit was brought against his sureties upon his official bond. It seems that service was obtained first upon Parker, and a judgment rendered against him, and subsequently against the other sureties, but execution being issued upon the judgment the entire estate of Parker was levied upon and sold. It brought twenty-three hundred and some odd dollars in money. The amount specified in the bill is the amount for which Parker's property had been sold.

But it appearing subsequently that Congress had imposed upon the internal-revenue collector additional duties out of which sprang the defalcation, all the sureties were released from liability under the bond and under the judgment. No one of the sureties has suffered to the extent of a cent except Parker. His whole estate was sold and sold for $2,300. The costs of that suit, however, being deducted from the amount of money received as the proceeds of the sale, leaves the $1,700 that the committee have reported in favor of returning to Parker.

If there is any justice in returning one cent of the money so collected from Parker, it seems to me that the whole amount for which his property was sold should be returned to him, so that he may be put on a footing of absolute equality with the other sureties relieved.

I do not think the amendment ought to be agreed to. Of course if I can not induce the Senate to disagree to it, Mr. Parker will be glad to get anything. He was absolutely ruined by reason of the suretyship, since which time Congress has relieved him and all other sureties, but his money has gone into the Treasury.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The facts in this case as they appeared to the Committee on Claims have been fairly stated by the Senator from Tennessee. There was a levy upon the property of this claimant, claimed to be worth $10,000, which was sold at public auction for about $2,300. Of that sum about $1,700 went into the Treasury of the United States.

After a judicial investigation of the obligations of the sureties on the bond, in subsequent proceedings it was ascertained judicially that there was no obligation on the part of these people to make the deficit good. This, however, had not been ascertained by Mr. Parker at the time the proceedings were had against him.

It might be held that, if the property was worth $10,000, by reason of the fact that the property was sacrificed at public sale and sold for less than $10,000, the Government ought to indemnify him for it; but I presume nobody will make any such claim. It might be held that whatever the property brought at public sale might be returned to him; or it might be held that the Government should return whatever it received from the sale of the property. That is exactly the point.

My impression was that as Mr. Parker had evidently suffered wrong in this matter, and his property was sold, the Government ought to make restitution to him of whatever it received, and as subsequent judicial investigation shows wrongfully received; that the amount of money the Government received ought to be returned to him.

However, if the Senate is willing to give him the amount of money for which his property was sold, amounting to several hundred dollars more than the Government received, I shall make no opposition. The Senate understands the facts as stated by the Senator from Tennessee, and after this statement of mine it understands what is involved in the case.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator state what became of the difference between what the Government received and what the property was sold for?

Mr. HARRIS. It went for the payment of the costs of the litigation.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. It was consumed in costs.

Mr. PLATT. Then I should think the Government ought to pay back what the property brought.

Mr. HARRIS. That is exactly my point. Of course what the property brought must be taken as its measure of value. I raise no question about that; but Congress has decided that on that judgment so erroneously rendered these sureties shall not suffer by reason of that suretyship; and to put Mr. Parker upon a footing of equality with the other sureties you must return to him the proceeds of the sale of his property.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the preamble, which the committee propose to strike out.

Mr. HARRIS. The preamble had better remain as it is, as it is necessary to an understanding of the bill.

The preamble was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT JACKSON, MICH.

Mr. PALMER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1990, being the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" and in line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide a site and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office, and for other Government uses, at Jackson, Mich. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $75,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodation for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $75,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States; nor until the State of Michigan shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PALMER. I move that the Senate ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SPOONER, Mr. DANIEL, and Mr. PALMER were appointed.

SIDE TRACK FOR BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. FARWELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1969, being the bill (H. R. 9977) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend a side track into square No. 1025, in the city of Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read at length for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company is hereby granted permission to extend a side track from the main line of its track, in the city of Washington, into square No. 1025, between Twelfth and Thirteenth streets and M and N streets southeast, under such conditions and regulations as may be imposed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia for the protection of the public in the use of streets affected and otherwise.

SEC. 2. The right of Congress to amend, alter, or repeal the franchises herein granted are hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to inquire whether this gives the right to go upon private property.

Mr. FARWELL. Not at all.

Mr. HAWLEY. To occupy one of the reservations?

Mr. FARWELL. Not at all. It is over near the Eastern Branch.

Mr. HAWLEY. What is the necessity of the legislation?

Mr. FARWELL. To cross a street with a side track.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not press that bill at this time. That is a bill upon which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] addressed the Senate, and in which, I think, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] feels an interest.

Mr. FARWELL. If the Senator will allow me I will make an explanation. This is a bill that does not involve that question at all. It is simply to permit this railroad company to build a side track down on a block near the Eastern Branch towards the navy-yard to enable them to take their coal. It is not connected with the question of railways in the city streets at all.

Mr. CALL. It is not the bill, then, to which the Senator from Maryland objected?

Mr. FARWELL. No, sir.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9977) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend a side track into square No. 1025, in the city of Washington.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in some and non-concurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10556) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and had agreed to other amendments of the Senate with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; that it asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HERBERT, Mr. MCADOO, and Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution providing that the Clerk be directed to inform the Senate that the House had elected Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN, a Representative from the State of Tennessee, as Speaker pro tempore during the temporary absence of the Speaker.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1082) to authorize the issuance of patent to certain land in Arkansas.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr.; that it further insisted upon its amendments to the bill, asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. MCSHANE, and Mr. KENNEDY the managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7708) to increase the pension of Annie Gibson Yates, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. HUTTON, and Mr. FINLEY the managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 94) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, Mr. STOCKDALE, and Mr. BROWER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 5) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Gallagher;

A bill (S. 102) for the relief of Lucinda McGuire;

A bill (S. 783) to correct the enrollment of an act approved March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to amend sections 1, 2, 3, and 10 of an act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from the State courts, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875;

A bill (S. 1076) granting a pension to the widow of John Leary, deceased;

A bill (S. 1575) granting an increase of pension to William Wallace Young;

A bill (S. 1762) granting a pension to Benjamin A. Burtram;

A bill (S. 2124) granting a pension to John Bush;

A bill (S. 2313) granting a pension to Ellen J. Snedaker;

A bill (S. 2366) granting a pension to Mrs. Emaline Anderson;

A bill (S. 2413) granting an increase of pension to Ernst Hein;

A bill (S. 2609) granting a pension to H. H. Russell;

A bill (S. 2655) granting a pension to Lydia Hawkins;

A bill (S. 2656) granting a pension to widow and minor children of Patrick Frawley;

A bill (S. 2653) granting a pension to Mary Curtin;

A bill (S. 2700) granting increase of pension to Allen Blethen;

A bill (S. 2779) granting a pension to Eliza M. Scandlin; and

A bill (S. 2830) granting an increase of pension to Elvira M. Dorman.

KENTUCKY ROCK GAS COMPANY.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the consent of the Senate to consider at this time House bill No. 8783, Order of Business on the Senate Calendar 1947, being a bill to authorize the Kentucky Rock Gas Company to lay conduit pipes across the Ohio and Salt Rivers, and will state that it has been reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] from the Committee on Commerce unanimously without amendment as passed by the House. I ask for its consideration now.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILKES BARRE, PA.

Mr. CAMERON. I move at this time that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1989, being the bill (S. 2535) for the erection of a public building at Wilkes Barre, Pa.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHMOND AND DANVILLE RAILROAD.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask consent of the Senate to call up Order of Business No. 1842, House bill 5663, authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has previously been considered as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment will be reported.

The amendment reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia was, in section 2, lines 4 and 5, after the word "purposes," to strike out:

And the city of Washington shall be a terminal point on said railroad and entitled to all privileges and facilities of other terminal points.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "thereon" at the end of line 7 should be stricken out. The Secretary will report that amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7 strike out the word "thereon;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That it shall be lawful for said Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to hold, use, occupy, and convey any real estate heretofore purchased or which may hereafter be purchased by it for corporate uses and purposes.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DANIEL. I move that the Senate ask a conference with the House of Representatives on the amendments made to the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DANIEL, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. FARWELL were appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 2774, authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia, being a bill on the same subject, will be indefinitely postponed.

APPRAISERS' WAREHOUSE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that on examination I withdraw the objection I made the other day to the bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Iowa yields to me to enable me to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to call up Calendar number 1812.

I ask consent of the Senate to take up Calendar No. 1812, being the bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes. The bill has been read and the committee amendments adopted, and I understand the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to withdraw his objection to the passage of the bill in its present form.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir. I rose to say that after examination and consultation with the Senator and with the Secretary of the Treasury I have come to the conclusion to let it go as it is.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read at length and the amendments agreed to it will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

FORT WALLACE RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa gave notice of his intention to call up the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I now do so, but will yield to the Senator from Kansas, who wants to ask for a conference.

Mr. PLUMB. No, I said it was a bill which had already passed the Senate, but the House passed a bill of its own, and as it is a matter of considerable importance to some settlers upon a military reservation, and the amendment already adopted by the Senate committee will make it necessary to have a conference, I want to put the bill through as early as possible. That is all.

Mr. ALLISON. Several Senators appeal to me for the consideration of bills that they say will take no time. I wish to have the sundry civil bill before the Senate, and then I will yield for a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. The Senator from Iowa yields to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask unanimous consent to consider Order of Business 2008, being the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the Union Pacific Railroad Company is hereby granted the preference right, for the period of three months after the appraisement herein provided for, to purchase the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 24, township 13 south, range 39 west, and fractional blocks 44, 49, 50, 51, 36, and 48, according to the town plat of the city of Wallace, the same being now occupied by said railroad company for depot and other purposes, at such price as may be fixed, without reference to the improvements thereon, by the Secretary of the Interior, not less than $2.50 per acre.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the amendment of the Senate to the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. PLUMB, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. BERRY were appointed.

MUSTER AND PAY OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent to take up Order of Business 1890, being the bill (H. R. 1560) to extend the provisions of "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield for the consideration of this bill if it takes no time and leads to no debate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to revive and extend the provisions of "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," approved June 4, 1884, as amended by the act approved February 3, 1887, for a period of five years from the 3d of June, 1887, and the limitation heretofore imposed by law on the presentation by officers or soldiers of claims for the loss of horses and equipments in the military service during the late war is suspended for the period of three years.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill is unanimously reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONUMENT ON PRINCETON BATTLE-FIELD.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask that Order of Business No. 1985, being the bill (S. 3379) in regard to a monumental column to commemorate the battle of Princeton, and appropriating $30,000, be now considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

J. SCHRIBER & CO.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask that the Senate take up Order of Business 1819, being the bill (S. 1493) for the relief of J. Schriber & Co., of Cleveland, Cuyahoga County, Ohio.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause the claim of J. Schriber & Co., of Cleveland, Cuyahoga County, Ohio, for internal-revenue stamps, which were destroyed, as they allege, by fire in the burning of their factory, in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 28th day of April, A. D. 1882, to be reopened. And that said J. Schriber & Co. be allowed to make proof, according to law, of the amount of internal-revenue stamps which were affixed to packages of fine-cut tobacco, which had never been out of their factory, and which were destroyed by the said fire; and upon their making satisfactory proof of such loss, that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated by law, such sum as will be sufficient to reimburse them therefor, according to section 3426 of the Revised Statutes as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE.

Mr. BECK. I do not rise to object to this bill, but I desire to give notice that after this morning I shall object to bills being taken up in this way if we can not proceed to the regular call of the Calendar. I have made that motion two or three times and pressed it as hard as I could. The mode in which we are now proceeding simply makes the President of the Senate the autocrat of this body to recognize any one he pleases or any bills he likes or they like, and bills that are on the Calendar entitled to real consideration can not be heard. My people have half a dozen House bills which I have tried to get up time and again. It is no fault of the President of the Senate. My bills have no right of precedence over those that stand ahead of them, and others have no right to precedence over those that stand behind them. I shall endeavor to-morrow morning to go to the Calendar regularly so as to give each bill a chance. I have tried it two or three times. I will try it again.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Kentucky made one observation just now which might, I think, bear a meaning which I am quite sure he did not himself intend.

Mr. BECK. I do not know what it was.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator said that this method of procedure made the President of the Senate the autocrat of this body and enabled him to have such bills passed as he pleased. Now, my experience and I think the experience of every gentleman on both sides of the Chamber has been that whenever any of these little times of vacation come, when the Senate is not urging any particular bill with great earnestness, the President of the Senate, the present occupant of the chair as well as his predecessors, has with entire impartiality to both sides of the Chamber recognized Senators in the order in which they have asked him at the desk to be recognized, and there has been no instance of favoritism either between the two sides of the Chamber or between individual Senators or between individual measures. I am quite sure the Senator from Kentucky did not mean to imply anything to the contrary, but his expression would seem to carry that implication.

Mr. BECK. The Senator need not have given himself the trouble to make that explanation to the Senate or to the country. I said that the Senate by this mode of proceeding necessarily compelled the President of the Senate to select from time to time those who get the floor. Now, I deny the right of Senators to go and put their names down on the President's list and get precedence by putting their names down; and yet the President of the Senate can not avoid it when they do. That is not the orderly way to do business. That is what I object to. I presume he would recognize me as quickly as anybody else; he always has, and always will, I think; but I want to get at business in an orderly way, and to-morrow morning I shall make the motion that the Senator from Tennessee has tried to do, and let us try to go on regularly with the Calendar for a day or two.

I am not complaining of the fairness of the President of the Senate in any shape or form, but the method of doing business necessarily produces these results, and if I used any offensive words, such as "autocrat," I did not mean them in any such sense. I meant that it prevented all from having a fair hearing; that is all, and we force the President to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before this subject passes from consideration the Chair begs the indulgence of the Senate to make a single observation.

The Chair has been subjected to great embarrassment by importunities, natural and reasonable, from members of the Senate for action upon bills in which they are concerned. The rules require the presiding officer to recognize the first Senator who rises in his place and addresses the Chair. When several rise simultaneously and address the Chair it is obviously impossible for that rule to be literally executed, and therefore, to avoid embarrassment, by the exercise of arbitrary authority and apparent partiality, the Chair has followed the practice of setting down upon a list alternately those who desire to be recognized, first upon one side of the Chamber and then upon the other, in the order in which they have applied, as being the only equitable and practicable method of escaping from the difficulties which the Chair experiences in consequence of the applications that are made for recognition.

The Chair has endeavored to be absolutely impartial and just to all persons desiring to pass bills, and if there be any other method that can be suggested, the Chair will be very glad indeed to listen to it and to comply with the wishes of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I am in sympathy with the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky, to devote the morning hour to the Calendar in its regular order, and hope it may be proceeded with in that way. But I desire to say, in connection with what has already been said, that when we fail to do that the practice of the Chair is the only one that can prevail, and that so far as I have been able to observe—and I have been a pretty close observer here for eleven and a half years—I am glad to say that absolute impartiality has characterized the conduct of the Chair continuously and always, as well the present presiding officer as every other who has occupied that chair. If we are going to take up bills upon motion in a scramble such as we have had this morning, the Chair is compelled to adopt the practice that has prevailed and that is prevailing here this morning by taking note either upon paper or otherwise of the order in which Senators rise and desire the floor, dividing equally between the two sides of the Chamber and in the order of their applications.

JOHN W. DURR.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from Iowa to yield to me that I may call up Calendar No. 1773, being the bill (S. 3248) for the relief of John W. Durr.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3248) for the relief of John W. Durr. It provides for the payment to John W. Durr, of Montgomery, Ala., of $125, in repayment of that sum overpaid by him on cash entry No. 20428, which said entry was made at the land office at Montgomery, Ala.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LINE OF WATER-PIPE IN DAWES COUNTY, NEBRASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON. I would not appeal to the Senator from Iowa were it not for the fact that I wish to move the consideration of a bill which of its kind is of importance. I ask for the consideration of Order of Business 1920, being the bill (S. 3331) to grant to the city of Chadron, Nebr., the right to lay pipe-lines across certain tracts of land.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the Senator.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

And provided further, That before entering upon said lands said city of Chadron shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a plat of the ground proposed to be used as aforesaid, and whenever said grounds shall cease to be used for the purpose for which granted they shall become the property of the adjoining proprietors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I ask that the appropriation bill be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment, offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After line 7 of page 46 it is proposed to insert:

Ten thousand dollars, to be expended, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the discovery and the recovery of the property of the United States held in adverse possession to the Government.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, this is a very small matter brought forward by officers of the Navy of the United States who had distinguished themselves in the late war, and some who had belonged to the Confederate States service. I had supposed that under such an indorsement as that it would not have excited any very great degree of opposition; but small as it is, and worthy and honorable as were the motives of these officers and soldiers of both sides in proposing it, it seems to have excited a great deal of apprehension on the part of some persons.

Now, Mr. President, the amendment is founded upon the Revised Statutes, section 5308, which provides that, whenever the owner of any such property—that is, property engaged in the war, or in any war or any insurrection against the United States—consents to such use or employment of the same, all such property shall be lawful subject of prize and capture wherever found; and it shall be the duty of the President to cause the same to be seized, confiscated, and condemned.

That is the statute of the United States which is the law to-day. It has been replied, in answer to that, by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], in a very elaborate argument upon this subject, in which the correspondence, that was intended to be secret and on file in the Treasury Department, has been made public and notice given to all such persons, if there are any such who hold this property, to get it out of the way.

It has been stated that there was no necessity for this, that the subject had already been very fully examined; but the very report from which the Senator read contradicted in direct terms his statement. In Executive Document No. 304, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, a former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McCulloch, says:

The result of all these arrangements has been the actual recovery of property of the Confederates to a large amount, with much more which it is confidently believed will in due time be recovered.

"With much more which it is confidently believed will in due time be recovered." This was on the 17th of April, 1868, and the Secretary of the Treasury has furnished here all the official documents on file in his Department. There is no account of this "how much more it is believed will be recovered." There is no evidence that this matter did not drop right at that point, where it has remained in profound obscurity.

Now, in these papers are the statements upon the point of the practical use of this amendment.

There is the evidence of several former officers of high standing now in private life, to the effect that they personally know of a vessel, whose locality has been traced out and indicated, which is not accounted for in these papers, and which they state they have reason to believe is in the original hands where it was when the war terminated. Is this a matter of no importance, not even worthy of investigation?

Now, Mr. President, what excuse has the Senator for ignoring this fact, if this law is obligatory upon him, when respectable men of veracity and standing state it over their own signatures?

But that is not all that is remarkable. Here are three witnesses of the highest character who state this fact of property as to which there has been no investigation, no proceeding taken, whose locality is known.

But that is not all. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] have refused to consider this matter, the Senator from Ohio stating that nothing could be done in relation to this subject; and the Senator from New York, that he had advised against it in former years.

But here is the official correspondence of the State Department under Mr. Seward, with Mr. Adams in England, declaring officially the status of the United States Government in respect to this property. I will read it in order that it may be seen that the Senator from New York was wrong, that the Government did commit itself, that it did require suit to be brought in the courts of England, and that said suit, in consequence of a subsequent agreement here with one particular person, was discharged, but discharged by virtue of an unauthorized arrangement made by a consul in Europe whose action was disavowed by the Government. That is not at all material to this case.

It does not affect it, but it is a little singular that, upon a small matter like this, propositions entirely untrue in regard to the public status of this Government should be advanced. Mr. Seward says:

Mr. Morse alleges in his justification that the arrangement would have resulted beneficially to the United States in securing a considerable sum of money or equivalent property, and in stopping legal expenses. He failed to consider that, as the suits in chancery then stood, property to be recovered and legal expenses had ceased to be of primary importance, those considerations having been superseded by considerations affecting our national honor generally, and more especially in regard to our relations with Great Britain.

The transaction referred to with Trenholm, Fraser & Co. was settled, I have no reason to doubt, honorably and justly. This little matter now in question has no reference to them or their affairs, nor to any one else in this country. Why there should be so much trepidation and alarm about a small matter like this I can not understand. Surely we can trust the Secretary and the President not to hurt any one.

Mr. President, I stated that there never had been any investigation, and that a great amount of property, which has doubtless to a large extent disappeared, has been left without even a history of the Confederate government and its transactions abroad being written, so far as the United States Treasury is concerned. Even as a matter of public history, a contribution to the history of the war and its results, and the resources of the Confederacy, the literature of the day will be greatly enlarged and benefited by the inquiry proposed by this amendment.

I have here the book of Captain Bulloch in regard to the secret service of the Confederate States in Europe. Captain Bulloch was an officer and a gentleman of high standing and of distinguished ability and fine intelligence, as I am informed. What does he say in regard to this matter?

Within about three months after the surrender of General Lee, a case involving the title to some alleged Confederate property was brought before the late vice-chancellor, Sir W. Page Wood (afterwards Lord Hatherley). That learned and most conscientious judge laid down the rule, that "whenever a government de facto has obtained possession of property, as a government, and for the purposes of the government de facto, the government which displaces it succeeds to all the rights of the former government and to the property they have so acquired."

I quote this to show how frivolous the objections made to this investigation, first, that the United States will make themselves liable for the debts of the Confederate States; second, that nothing can be recovered; and, third, that it is in bad taste for a Confederate to move in this matter.

That being the public law as interpreted in the courts of Great Britain, and not this figment of the imagination, which has no kind or foundation, of the Senator from Missouri, that there could be a possible succession to the debts of the Confederacy, that having been settled in the courts of England, Captain Bulloch says:

I will undertake to say that all of the official representatives of the late Confederate government in Europe would have accepted it, and would have loyally assisted any reputable and duly authorized agent of the United States in winding up affairs, so as to secure to that government their just rights. But it did not suit Mr. Seward's purpose to proceed in accordance with Vice-Chancellor Wood's interpretation of the law. He manifestly wished not only to get possession of the Confederate property, but to punish those who had dealt with the insurgents.

Persons whom no one knew anything about were sent to England to spy out the land and to discover if there was any Confederate property within reach. Arrangements were made with those persons that they were to receive a portion of the property which might be recovered through their efforts. The persons referred to were soon in consultation with the Liverpool consul, and it was generally known that they were traveling about the country and making inquisitorial inquiries into the alleged transactions of various tradespeople with the late Confederate agents.

It will, I think, be admitted that these were not dignified proceedings, and it is at least doubtful whether any respectable government ever before attempted to settle important matters by such means. Mr. Seward could hardly have supposed that any Confederate agent who had due regard for his own personal honor, or who retained any loyal feeling of obligation to those who had come into business relations with him, would either approach or permit himself to be approached by those "commission agents." I wish to cast no reflection upon them personally, but their office was one that would not have tempted a representative of the Confederate government to join in their explorations.

It is worthy of mention that the plan of getting possession of Confederate property through such means did not result in much pecuniary profit. By a return published in the Congressional document referred to above it appears that the gross proceeds of the property thus obtained in England during the years 1866 and 1867 amounted to $144,157.15, the greater portion of which accrued from the sale of the Shenandoah, which realized $108,632.18, against which are charged disbursements to the amount of $90,308.76.

This book contains all the information that has ever been furnished upon this subject, and in this letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in the letter of Mr. Dudley, who represented the United States Government, it is stated that this property is scattered throughout Europe in the hands of various persons, and Captain Bulloch in detail indicates, and a portion of that schedule, I apprehend, is made from statements made by him in regard to this property.

Is it a matter of no interest to this Government, leaving out of view the provisions of the law, that something should be known in regard to the operations and resources of the Confederate government in Europe during the war? I undertake to say that there is no information upon the files of the Department, and I think this resolution has brought all that there is there except what is contained in this book of Captain Bulloch, and that does not show the ships which are now reported by these intelligent officers as afloat and in private hands that have been in any way either investigated or accounted for.

I do not speak of the Confederate vessels which were bought by the British Government and the money paid over and which have never been accounted for. I am not seeking to bring anybody to account. I do not think it would be a proper thing for me, having been one concerned in the late war, to pretend to any excessive zeal upon this subject. I do not. My sympathies were with those engaged in that struggle. I have no shame in regard to it. I am a loyal citizen of the United States and a Senator here and obedient to the laws.

I had no hesitation in bringing this amendment here at the request, not of those who rendered faithful service in the Confederate States navy, not of those who shared its honors and its emoluments, and who now enjoy those of the United States, but at the request of those men who gave their blood and fought as private soldiers for what they believed to be right, and what was dear to them from tradition and sympathy of blood and kindred, men in the humbler walks of life, whose belief expressed itself in action, in self-sacrifice, in privation, and every form of suffering.

But, Mr. President, this little matter of an appropriation of $10,000 for the employment of some Confederate soldiers in a useful service to the United States seems to have excited a great deal of apprehension, a great deal of opposition, notwithstanding Captain Bulloch, the Confederate agent abroad, in his book asserts that this is what the Government should have done, that it should have appointed agents in sympathy with those people who could have approached them and ascertained the facts in regard to it, and he asserts that it has never been done to this day, notwithstanding it was urged and a distinguished officer of the United States Navy seems to have favored it, whose name has been brought here by the Senator from Missouri without any kind of warrant, for Admiral Luce, who, I am impressed with, from my intercourse with him, as an officer and a man who would do honor to any naval service or to any pursuit or occupation in life, a man thoroughly versed in the knowledge of his profession, a gentleman in all the amenities of life, who happened when he was in charge of the squadron in the West Indies, having rendezvoused at Key West and becoming acquainted with me called my attention to the fact as a Senator from Florida of the accessibility of Key West with its magnificent harbor, its command of the Gulf of Mexico, to attack from the West Indies, and to the fact as a matter of general notoriety that vessels built with Confederate money, as was notoriously stated, were then there in the hands of private commercial people who had rendered no service to either side, and for whom neither side had any sympathy, and left me with the idea that at least in the judgment of men of the Navy an inquiry should be had into the subject.

Why should that excite the Senator from Missouri into such a demonstration as he has made? He says Admiral Luce's great discovery! A reflection on this officer for having told to me what he saw, not for public use, not to be proclaimed to the people in possession of these ships, not professing it to be a discovery, but simply a fact that these vessels, better, as he said, than any in the Navy of the United States, and two of them were the Confederate rams which are referred to in Captain Marmaduke's statement as having been bought by the British Government from the Messrs. Laird, a full account of which is contained in this book of Captain Bulloch.

Now, Mr. President, who can deny that here is ground at least for inquiry, if it be no more than a contribution to history? Who is to be hurt by it? Are these gallant gentlemen whose lives have been so indorsed and approved, whose services in the Confederate States navy have attracted the admiration and respect of their opponents—are they the spies to whom the Senator referred? Can not they be trusted? Can not the Secretary of the Treasury be trusted with this little amount of money to ascertain what has become of this property, which Captain Bullock, the secret agent of the Confederate States navy, in his book refers to, and of which you have no kind of record in your Departments, and which have never been even investigated?

Why, Mr. President, there is nothing in all that. I can not see that there is even a reasonable ground for opposition to this amendment. I presume that the Secretary of the Treasury will not send anybody to Europe unless there should be found a necessity for it. I never dreamed of anybody going to Europe under this amendment. Neither do I suppose any one else ever did, except the Senator from Ohio; but suppose they should, that is not a very great thing, and the Republic would survive it.

I do think that when a great power which has made history, a power which can not be erased from the history of the century, because it was a profound conviction of the people founded upon tradition and the teachings of generations manifesting itself in action, in heroic action, giving birth to men like Lee and Jackson, whom all time will honor for their elevated character, whose statues should now, in the interest of humanity, stand side by side in the national Capitol with those of the great men who maintained the Union—when that great power which existed in history and maintained a war founded upon honest conviction, which taxed the resources of this great Government and people to their utmost for years, and then dissolved and disappeared, and there does not appear to be even a record of their great resources abroad, of the large quantity of the cotton and munitions of war, which are exhibited here in some kind of detail, but not professedly with any great accuracy by Captain Bulloch; and when he points out the fact that an inquiry such as this and in the hands of gentlemen such as these who are familiar with the facts, as a matter of history alone, if for no other purpose should be gone into, and these unimpeachable witnesses point out the fact that some of these magnificent vessels, their name, their locality pointed out, which are not accounted for, and which his book shows not to have been accounted for, are still in the hands of some persons that possess them under charter-parties which were taken as a feint to prevent them from being held by the British Government under the diplomatic arrangement between this country and England, and held, as these gentlemen say, by men to whom neither side owes either sympathy or obligation.

Does it hurt my friend from Missouri that some Confederate officer who graduated at Annapolis and who followed his advice and instruction in abandoning the United States flag and fighting with distinction and honor, now poor and starving, and with a family depending upon him, may get employment and render good service to history and to the country? Is it an object that should excite his virtuous and patriotic indignation as a Senator of the United States that $10,000 should be expended in this investigation to be used in the employment of these Confederates to render this service to the Government and the truth of history?

Mr. President, I do not care to say more upon this subject; I feel no great interest in it. I introduced the amendment because it is in pursuance of a requirement of existing law, because the Secretary of the Treasury under the advice of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], of the Senator-elect from Virginia, Mr. Barbour, and myself, and of an admiral of the Navy and some officers of the Confederate States navy recommended Mr. Littlepage for this position and employment, and he did good service until the funds of the Treasury Department were exhausted and a deficiency occurred; and I here venture to say, notwithstanding the slighting allusion that has been made to him, that there is no officer of the late Confederate government who rendered more gallant service than did Captain Littlepage on board the Merrimac in her distinguished contest with the Monitor. I venture to say that among those who represented the Confederate States flag there is no officer who served and no private who made a higher and brighter record as a man of gallantry, fidelity, and courage than he did at that time.

Now, Mr. President, I cite to those who desire to act intelligently on this subject the law, the statute of the United States. I cite the statement of Captain Marmaduke of his services on board one of these ships, of his being commissioned on her, of her being actually in commission from the Confederate States. I cite the statement that she is now running upon the high seas under a charter-party given to evade the diplomatic arrangements made between Great Britain and the United States, and a charter-party in which they were required to give security that she should not be turned over to the Confederate States, and the statement that she still remains without change and without investigation through these twenty-one years, subject to the just demand of the Government, in the hands of persons to whom neither side, I am informed, owe any obligation of gratitude.

That is all I care to say upon this subject. I have no desire to mix myself up in it in one way or another. It is the right thing to do. It is right in respect to the history of the country; it is right in respect to the necessities of the public service; it is right in respect to sworn obligations of the Senators of the United States, and I can see no inconsistency and no bad taste supporting it in a man who was concerned in the Confederate war, proud of its traditions and of the honor and character that were made by the people of those States in that service, and a firm and faithful discharge of the duties of a citizen and a Senator of the United States.

I can see no reason why there should not be a faithful and correct account rendered of these transactions of the Confederate government abroad. I can see no reason why, if any person has any of that money or that property, he should not now render, as should have been done long ago, a correct and faithful statement in regard to it, the more especially when in the legitimate and proper service of the Government of the United States in doing this duty some good men will find employment and compensation.

But as regards this little matter it concerns nothing more than the single ship which was referred to in the testimony of these gentlemen; and I undertake to say here, notwithstanding the Senator from Missouri made light of it, he can not contradict the statements made by Captain Marmaduke and by Mr. Littlepage and by several Confederate officers of distinction, which render the probability very great if not a matter of absolute legal proof, that there is property yet which should be inquired into, not in this country, but sailing upon the high seas, which it is important and it is to the honor and dignity of this Government at least, and to its character in conducting its business with some order and method, should be looked into.

I think it will be somewhat difficult to give any intelligible and plausible reason for the earnest effort to suppress and prevent even an inquiry into this subject. Admitting all that the opponents of this amendment say, it does not present the least reason why this amendment should not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. CALL. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dislike to prolong this debate, and will not for more than one minute, simply to say that a committee of which I was a member some years ago had special occasion to investigate this whole subject as far as we could then obtain any knowledge, and were satisfied, from what had already been done, that it was a perfectly useless waste of the public treasure to undertake to pursue the assets of the late corporation of the Confederate States any further, and that the wisest thing we could do would be to treat the assets as we were taught to treat "the late unpleasantness"—by forgetting it and letting it go.

I hope this amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Vermont if he has seen and read the statements of the different officers in regard to the specific facts in relation to this vessel?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have seen them.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Vermont has not seen them yet, there are three respectable gentlemen of distinguished veracity who testify to the present locality and the circumstances under which this vessel passed into the hands of those now having her, and if he has not seen these statements and does not attach any importance to them and knows nothing about them, then I submit to the Senator that his remarks upon an investigation some years ago on other evidence, in regard to which no one knows anything but himself, even if it convinced his judgment then, can not reasonably do so at this time. In short, his objection is entirely unreasonable, and can not be founded on any theory which can be the basis of a reasonable opinion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be perfectly true. We may locate this vessel as in old fox-hunting times when I was a boy we could locate a fox in the bottom of a narrow cave 100 feet in the mountain, but the thing was how were you going to get the fox out. Every cent of money spent in these pursuits will be lost and nothing will be gained by it. That is all.

Mr. CALL. If we are to decide things by mere statements of that kind, then there is no answer that can be made. The proposition of the Senator is that is so because it is so. But as to the correctness and comparison of a specific statement of three witnesses, some of them officers of the Union Navy and some of the Confederate navy, who served on that ship, who state the specific facts upon their veracity as men, that a vessel which was built and paid for by the Confederate government is now upon the high seas, designating the port and the hands in whose possession she is; that she was placed under a charter-party under bonds not to be delivered to the Confederate government; that she was under that charter party at the termination of the war, and that she has continued to run under it—if these facts stated here in these papers are true, and if the statute of the United States is obligatory upon the Senator from Vermont on his oath and his conscience, that if there be such property the President of the United States should be required to take it, and Senators here should furnish him the means to do it; if all these facts are to be set aside by the simple declaration of the Senator that it is like a fox in a hole, why, well and good.

That is the state of facts in regard to it; that is the evidence, and I have cited it. I have cited the report of Captain Bulloch, and, as is shown, there has never been an attempt to get possession of this vessel. What money has been paid to suppress the information, what officials have been corrupted to betray the honor and interest of the United States I know not; but I do know that it is plainly the imperative duty of every Senator to see that the money of the United States is obtained to relieve the people from taxation and to be used for public purposes.

Men with Confederate sympathies should not be restrained from doing their duty. The money should be obtained. The one-legged and one-armed maimed and disabled soldiers of the Confederate war who followed their honest opinions should not be deprived of the opportunity of appointment under this provision, and charity to them would be better than to leave it in the hands of those who have defrauded the Government of the United States of its rights. The Senator from Vermont can not evade his duty by such a pretense as has been made here.

Mr. GIBSON. I have great respect for the sentiments and sympathies of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], but I differ from him entirely in respect to the expediency and propriety of this investigation.

In the first place, we have no request from the President of the United States or from the Secretary of the Treasury or from any Executive Department of the Government for an appropriation for this specific purpose; and in the absence of such a request, with all the information they have in their possession, I submit that it would not be proper for Congress to vote such an appropriation as this.

Mr. President, the presumption is that the Southern Confederacy made a complete and honorable surrender of all its assets to the Government of the United States. I believe that the officers of the three Confederate armies that were surrendered made a surrender in accordance with the terms and conditions which were imposed upon them at that time, and that the naval force, whatever it might be and wherever it was, made likewise an honorable surrender according to the terms which were imposed upon these armies and upon these forces of the Confederacy, whether on land or on sea. The terms imposed were such as became the commanders of the great armies of the Northern States, victorious in a gigantic war against the armies of the people of the Southern States. I had myself the honor to be a commissioner for the surrender of one of these armies, and I bear willing testimony to the courtesy and kindness with which the commissioners on the part of the Federal Army treated us and to the generosity of the terms which were extended to us, and to the firmness of the Federal commanders, especially General Grant, when relentless politicians demanded victims for slaughter and vengeance.

Under these circumstances I submit that at this late day it is not proper to call in question the validity, the integrity of the surrender that was made by the officers representing the Confederate forces on land and on sea. Such an investigation, I am informed, was undertaken many long years ago. It amounted to nothing.

The representations of the fabulous wealth that was hid away in Europe or in distant seas, in the possession of Confederate officers, lost to their own sense of honor, were shown to be mere flags of wind. It is very much like the stories circulated by adroit lawyers or shysters about possessions belonging to American heirs in England and in France, Belgium, and Holland. I remember a few years ago the celebrated J. P. Benjamin, at that time the leader of the English bar, as he had been one of the leaders of the American bar, and whose learning and genius gave luster to this Senate, told me that so frequently were communications sent to him on that subject that he had found it necessary to issue a circular and give it to the public press, notifying the people of the United States that in nearly all instances these claims were set up for great estates in England upon fraudulent representations, and were intended merely to fill the pockets of the persons who offered their services to these absent heirs. Recently one of the representatives of the United States to Belgium or Holland has given public notice warning our countrymen against such representations made in order to deceive them.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, it was Mr. Phelps, the minister to England.

Mr. GIBSON. And I think Mr. Bell, of Belgium, likewise.

So I submit it is not necessary, under all these circumstances, that we should embark in this enterprise, this voyage of discovery to ascertain whether or not there be some property hid away somewhere by delinquent officers of the late Confederate States.

Sir, the Confederate States died a manly and a noble death on the field of battle many long years ago, and all that was left of them was that sentiment of honor which the men who carried the musket in the ranks and the officers who wore wreaths on their collars inherited from a proud ancestry and which I believe will be transmitted to and abide with the people of the Southern States so long as our mountains shall lift their summits to the skies or our rivers flow to the sea.

I would inscribe upon its memorial tablet the epitaph penned by the greatest of our race for his own:

> Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear
> To dig the dust inclosed here:
> Blest be the man that spares these stones,
> And curst be he that moves my bones.

Mr. DAWES. My position in the Committee on Appropriations, where this whole subject was pretty thoroughly examined, and the position I take here is this: We have here a suggestion of such a peculiar character, and which must be pursued in such a delicate way, in which the Government itself must take the lead and take the charge and be responsible at every step, that we ought not to embark in it unless the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury says that he has in his possession such information as justifies him in recommending such a step.

Now, without discussing the question whether there does exist or does not exist any considerable property which, under any possible construction, could come from the Confederate government to us which has not come, it seems to me so plain and so palpable that it is a matter of national conduct that if we pursue it a single step the whole investigation will rest upon the Government of the United States itself, and sooner or later, if there is anything at all in it, it must be diplomatic to some extent at least.

Unless the Government of the United States will take upon itself the responsibility of saying "we have such information in our possession that justifies us in asking for a sum of money to pursue further the investigation," then it should not be undertaken at all. I did not stop to inquire into the probable cause, the prima facie case presented by the Senator from Florida. Be it good or be it bad, be it of substance or of air, nobody should undertake this work but the Government of the United States, and that Government upon its responsibility and its sense of obligation in the administration of public affairs. The moment any official like the Secretary of the Treasury or the President of the United States shall say to Congress, "This is a matter which I have reason to believe ought to be pursued," the Congress of the United States will be willing to respond, and I do not think the Congress of the United States ought to respond unless it be to some substantial and responsible appeal from the executive department.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him does not the amendment leave it entirely in the hands of the Government, and do not these facts which are here submitted furnish sufficient evidence to move the judgment of the Senator to give him the opportunity of ascertaining whether or not this investigation should be had?

Mr. DAWES. I say I did not look at the papers. The Senator says that appeals have been made, so that somebody should be responsible for initiating this action, and they have been made without response. Can the Senator tell me why, if these things are before the executive department of the Government, and they think this an object that ought to be pursued, the executive department have not asked for it?

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator if there is any more obligation on the part of the executive department to do what is right than there is on the Senate?

Mr. DAWES. All this matter is before the Department. All this matter has been in the Department for twenty years. It has been brought before the Committee on Appropriations by the earnest zeal, the honest zeal of the Senator from Florida. The Senator from Florida has had this answer presented to him time and again, and he has been told that if he would bring the responsible indorsement of the Department wherein all this has been these many years, the committee would respond to it; and I have no doubt the Senate would.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter into the general discussion of this subject, but as I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida I wish to state the facts which will show that I am not animated by any desire to prevent any investigation or ascertainment as to the existence of any property which belonged to the Confederacy and which ought to be taken possession of by the United States.

This matter comes before us without the official recommendation of any officer of the Government. It comes before us on the application of a man who wants employment. The matter had been investigated from year to year by the Government, and directly after the close of the war. One of the Secretaries of the Treasury has already informed the Senate as to his belief in the impropriety of making this appropriation.

The statements contained in these papers show that the man who makes them believes that in thirty-seven items of property and money which he says belonged to the Confederacy and ought to be recovered by the United States, there was nearly $36,000,000 worth.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REAGAN. I would be glad to make my statement without interruption. This man believes that there is nearly $36,000,000 worth of such property, and then he states that there were a number of other items besides, the value of which he does not give. He states that a number of vessels which would make a respectable fleet for the United States belonged to the Confederacy and ought now to belong to the United States, besides the millions of money and property in foreign countries, and in addition this man states that there are large amounts of money and property in the United States in the same condition.

Among them he makes a statement that there is in railroads, mills, and foundries, etc., in Davis and Marion Counties, Texas, $3,000,000 worth of property which ought to belong to the United States, which was the property of the Confederacy. Mr. President, there was not a railroad in Marion County until long after the war, and therefore the Confederacy did not own what did not exist. If the Confederate government ever owned a dollar of property in that county I do not know of it.

There was a foundry in Marion County before the war that made cast-metal, pots, ovens, and such things. Since the war it makes that kind of ware and plows, and perhaps some pig-iron. But it was private property before the war; it is private property yet; and if the Confederate government ever had work done there I have no conception of it or knowledge of it. Taking that as an example, what credit are we to give to statements so recklessly made?

The papers in this case make one think that "Mulberry Sellers" should retire from the stage and one as much superior to him in the prolific character of his imagination as he was to ordinary matter-of-fact people ought to take his place. Can it be that $37,000,000 worth of property belonged to the Confederacy that ought now to be acquired by the United States, a quarter of a century after the war, and after the Government has exhausted all its efforts to acquire such property as it could which belonged to the Government and abandoned the subject? A man comes in and wants a job, and he brings such a story as this!

Mr. President, if there was any foundation for it the Secretary of the Treasury would know it, because in the archives of his Department are all the facts that are needed. It is for these reasons, for the extravagance of the statements, for the unreliability of the statements, for the unreasonableness of them, and in the absence of any recommendation by those in authority, that I shall vote against the proposed amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Iowa to withdraw that motion for a moment. It would be hardly fair to me to make it now after the statement of the Senator from Texas. Of course there is some courtesy due.

Mr. ALLISON. I will withdraw it for a moment with the understanding that I shall renew it when the Senator from Florida concludes.

Mr. CALL. I wish to say that I deny the statement of the Senator from Texas, and I ask him to produce the proof of it. I say that no gentleman I know of whose testimony is in this record has made a statement of the kind he refers to. I ask him to produce the proof of it. I deny the statement.

Mr. REAGAN. Here it is in the papers which were read. I am not familiar with the papers. I only glanced at them.

Mr. CALL. Then the Senator ought not to say that.

Mr. REAGAN. The very first one of the items read by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is as follows:

Item No. 1: Consists of iron works and lands, together with flouring mills, machine-shops, foundries, and railroads in Marion and Davis Counties, Texas, cost to the Confederate government, as can be shown to ours, $3,000,000.

Mr. CALL. Who made that statement? The Senator said that somebody who wanted employment made that statement.

Mr. REAGAN. The man who makes the items of property made it. Mr. Littlepage gave in that as one of the items that belonged to the Confederacy.

Mr. CALL. Mr. Littlepage's name is not upon that paper. He never made such a statement. He has no connection with it. I so stated yesterday, and I defy the Senator from Texas to produce any evidence of it. He has reflected upon the character and the good judgment and the good sense of a gentleman of high character and standing without a particle of evidence.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator has investigated this subject and knows who made the statement. Who did make it?

Mr. CALL. I stated yesterday that these items, as I was informed, had been compiled from the statements of Confederate officers, much of it in this book here.

Mr. REAGAN. By whom?

Mr. CALL. I do not know by whom, but it was——

Mr. REAGAN. Does the Senator doubt that Mr. Littlepage compiled that statement and put in the papers?

Mr. CALL. I do. I have no evidence that Mr. Littlepage had anything to do with it. I stated that it was compiled from the records of the Department, and referred to by him as containing items of which he had knowledge.

Mr. President, I wish this matter to stand fairly before the Senate and not to be condemned upon improper ground, and not upon censures and reflections upon men as good as any others. Mr. Littlepage did not originate this investigation. It came from officers of the Union Navy who saw in it an opportunity of promoting the interests of the public service and at the same time giving useful and needful employment to some deserving men of the Confederate States service who had stood all the dangers but had received none of the benefits of official rank.

Mr. REAGAN. It is immaterial who made the statement. It is certainly a very extravagant and a very false statement. That is the ground upon which we are asked to make this appropriation.

Mr. CALL. Not at all. No one has asked that an appropriation should be made on the ground of this item. The specific item on which the appropriation was asked has been stated and reiterated until it has become tedious to state it again.

This information was sent here in response to a resolution asking the Secretary of the Treasury to send all the papers of which he had any knowledge on file in his Department, and why Mr. Littlepage should be connected with it because there are some letters of his in reference to the subject I can not imagine, nor why he should be assailed in this way, nor Admiral Luce—who had nothing to do with it—or any one else.

Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] made a speech upon this subject, and he might as well have talked about the moon or the north pole or the south pole. There is no question here as to the good faith of Confederate officers in surrendering property. This matter has nothing to do with the Confederate army or with what they did in the surrender. Why take that ground? Why impute to any one an impeachment of Confederate officers and their good faith in this matter?

Here is the statement of Captain Bulloch, the secret officer of the Confederacy abroad, in regard to agents charged with this money, stating facts with particularity, showing that this property was not surrendered, and yet the Senator from Louisiana says he has no doubt that it was all surrendered. He has no reason for this opinion; he gives none; he can give none, and he is contradicted in his statement by Captain Bulloch.

Mr. President, I am not going to prolong this debate any further. I offered the amendment, as I said, not because I cared anything about it, but at the request of some very intelligent and reputable officers of the United States Navy and of the Confederate States navy. I do not sympathize with the Senator from Louisiana in his opinion that the dust of the Confederacy should be buried, and that good friends would let it alone. The Confederate States will live in history for the great and heroic characters that they developed.

There is no need to let their dust remain undisturbed. There are written in the immortal pages of history the endurance, the heroic virtue, the illustrious characters of men like Lee, Jackson, and others; and I am glad to know that the heart of the North and its soldiers respond to that sentiment. I am not ashamed of the Confederate States, and I do not wish its dust to remain undisturbed. That government and its place in history can not be overlooked. It has no dust, but it has the immortal glory, the heroic character of noble self-sacrifice. Its memories are not connected with the abstraction of Confederate property, or an attempt to protect those who unlawfully hold it against honor and duty.

I confess my sympathies are all with the rank and file of the Confederate soldiers, with the widows and children of the nameless dead, whose bodies lie in unmarked and unknown graves, of whose fortitude, privations, bravery, wounds, and death no record tells, for whose desolate homes no pension or bounty from a generous government comes, whose widows and children have no heritage, but the widow's tale of the brave and gallant father who at the bidding of duty as he understood it marched forth with a brave but sad heart never again to gladden his home with his presence.

For him and them and for the survivors who went into battle and came home with nothing but wounds and the consciousness of duty bravely performed—for these my heart opens with affection and solicitude. If consistent with duty to the Government and others honorable and useful employment can be given to them without detriment to the just claims of others I shall not fail to do it.

I am disappointed to find that this feeling does not find place with all of us. I am disappointed that other views and feelings and opinions of public duty and policy seem to be of sufficient weight to induce a majority of those, who, like myself, are enjoying the honor and emolument of official position under the United States, rather to protect the possessors of ill-gotten property of the Confederate States in their wrongful appropriation of this public property, than to give employment to Confederate soldiers of character and merit who are in want in securing it for the Government. Once secured, the generous sentiments of the Union soldier would require its disposition in some form of public benevolence for their benefit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Iowa to move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. CALL. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered the amendment can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COKE. I object. I prefer a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas objects to the request of the Senator from Florida to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I renew my motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire, in response to what has been said, to read a paragraph from what Mr. Littlepage said:

In addition to the above report—

That is, the report which he makes—

In addition to the above report, I beg to file an itemized statement of Confederate properties unrecovered by the United States Government, but which might have been recovered had proper steps been taken. I believe that a large amount of the property described may yet be recovered, although so many years have elapsed.

I simply present that to show that Mr. Littlepage presented the paper to which reference was made.

Mr. CALL. I said Mr. Littlepage presented it, but nowhere did Mr. Littlepage state that it was a correct list. He says he believes the larger part of the property enumerated might be recovered, and he believes if proper steps had been taken it might all have been recovered. So does Captain Bulloch and so does Mr. Dudley, the representative of the United States, in the papers now before the Senate, which I have read.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator misremembers the statement. He does not say "the larger part."

Mr. CALL. The Senator just read it.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Littlepage says:

In addition to the above report, I beg to file an itemized statement of Confederate properties unrecovered by the United States Government, but which might have been recovered had proper steps been taken.

Not a part of it, but all of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment without putting the Senate to the trouble of a vote.

Mr. ALLISON. That was objected to.

Mr. COKE. I object. I want a vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to lay the amendment of the Senator from Florida on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. On page 94, at the end of line 17, I move to insert:

For the completion of the monument at Washington's Headquarters at Newburgh, N. Y., and of the statues thereon, according to the plans adopted by the joint select committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, under joint resolution of the two Houses, and for gates therein, according to the recommendation of the Secretary of War contained in Executive Document numbered 336, Fiftieth Congress, first session, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $32,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not know whether the Committee on Appropriations will desire to oppose the amendment or not. It is for the completion of the monumental structure at Newburgh commemorative of the great transactions at the close of the Revolutionary war. A structure has been erected there, completed, and accepted by the Government, and the money paid for its construction, in some sense for its completion; but the original plan of the structure provided for four external statues. The plan approved by the Government contained that arrangement of the structure.

The present estimate is that $5,000 each for those statues will be required; and then in the form of the structure, which is not an obelisk but a structure more commemorative, as it was supposed, of the situation of things. There are four large open archways of entrance. The plan did not provide for the gates to these entrances, and the estimates for bronze gates at each of those four entrances will cost $3,000 each, making altogether an estimate of $32,000, which is sent in by the Secretary of War, with a more specific and complete statement of Colonel Wilson, United States Army. I hope there will be no opposition made to the insertion of the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Newburgh was the headquarters of General Washington during very important operations of the Revolution, when he was engaged in the effort, which proved successful, of preventing the English forces coming through Canada from forming a line across the Hudson with the forces at New York City. Historians have believed that if the English army had been able to succeed in making that junction and isolating New England from the other States the fate of the Revolution might have been very different from what it was.

The place is connected with most important historical associations. The Government has already authorized the construction of a monument, which is a very creditable one, commemorative of the incident referred to. A good many things have been collected there which are connected with that period of the Revolution.

I trust that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York will be adopted, to complete and perfect the monument already begun.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. On page 51, after line 10, I move to insert:

To enable the Secretary of State to purchase from John H. Haswell, chief of the Bureau of Indexes and Archives in the Department of State, the manuscript of "The Chronological History of the Department of State and the Foreign Relations of the Government from September 5, 1774, to July 1, 1885," prepared by him, the sum of $6,000 is hereby appropriated.

And the Public Printer is hereby authorized, upon the requisition of the Secretary of State, to cause to be printed and bound in cloth, for the use of the Department of State, 5,000 copies of the above-mentioned work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. EVARTS. If no objection is made to the amendment, I will read a single clause from the report of Secretary of State Frelinghuysen, who describes this work. Mr. Frelinghuysen said:

The work has been compiled by Mr. Haswell with the greatest regard for completeness and accuracy—about twelve years having been consumed by him (outside of his regular duties at the Department) in its preparation—and he has succeeded in arranging its contents in such a form as to facilitate in the highest possible degree a reference to any particular subject or to the official history of any individual, thus insuring its value as a handbook of reference. Many important facts in the early history of our foreign relations not hitherto known have been discovered by the author in his exhaustive researches among the Government archives, and are here presented for the first time; and his work is of especial value because it completes the imperfect records of the early period of this Department, many of which were destroyed during the war of 1812.

The present Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, mentions this item among the estimates which he furnished to the Committee on Appropriations.

I take great pleasure myself in saying that Mr. Haswell was and is one of the best and most intelligent employés in a responsible position, and that this record which he presents from 1774 to the present day is of real importance to the Government. The amount proposed to be appropriated is only $6,000, and it is the work of twelve years out of office hours.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that this amendment has been before the Senate at nearly every session of Congress for the last ten years.

Mr. EVARTS. I should think not so long.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is an old stager.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose it should be put on the bill. I do not know that we could resist it successfully.

Mr. EVARTS. I can hardly think that this proposed item of appropriation has been before the Senate for such a length of time.

Mr. ALLISON. I may be mistaken; it may be only eight years, but I know we have considered it on every sundry civil appropriation bill for some years past.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. Frelinghuysen's recommendation was in 1884, and I do not think there was any during my time.

Mr. ALLISON. I think before the Senator's time as Secretary of State there was probably a recommendation.

Mr. EVARTS. I should hope really that the manuscript might be printed and proper compensation given to this gentleman.

Mr. PLUMB. The amendment brings up a rather pertinent inquiry, which I think perhaps somebody ought to make. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York if he knows of anybody else about the State Department who has anything he would like to sell to the Government which has been the result of his official service? Changes of administration have occurred, and changes are liable to occur again. There ought to be some rule, either that when these people go out they shall have something in the nature of a gratuity to compensate them for the agony of departure, or that there shall be a general shaking of clothes, and that they shall not take away anything which really belongs to the Government.

We shall be liable, of course, to surprises of this kind, growing out of the fact that some diligent person, not finding the Government service sufficient to occupy his laboring hours, has employed himself in making buttons or books or something else, which in due time he asks Congress to buy.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. Haswell is at the head of the Bureau of Archives, and is fully employed during the hours of service. In a period of twelve years, as the Secretary states, outside of office hours he has completed a valuable document which will be of daily use in the Department, and be of occasional service to a multitude of others. There was no obligation on his part to perform this work out of office hours. His salary does not cover anything beyond his office hours.

It is purely a question whether the Government will publish a work which was produced in the Department, and which could not be produced except by some one in the Department. Neither the intelligence nor the means of prosecuting or verifying the facts can be in the hands of any one but an inmate of that establishment. Therefore the question is narrowed down to this: A foreign agency introduced there can not produce the result. This gentleman can produce the result. He is under no obligation to produce it except by reasonable expectation of compensation for the work if it is valuable.

If the Senator from Kansas will not take the word of the present Secretary of State and of the late Secretary, Mr. Frelinghuysen, that it is a valuable work, I can not convince him by anything that I could say; but I have rescued at least Mr. Haswell from any opprobrium or any reproach. He is at the head of an important function there which occupies all his time, and this work of his can not be done except by one having access to the archives; and it has been done by him outside of his regular services. The work, then, must be omitted from the means and resources of this Government if this $6,000 is not allowed.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think it can be charged upon anybody that he has been immoral in trying to get money out of the Treasury of the United States. That is a wholesome, a useful, and it is getting to be a somewhat universal occupation. Therefore I can not impute to this person anything in the nature of dishonor or even impropriety in this matter. But at every Congress some one we have employed, and whose services we are supposed to have, seems to have been using the most valuable part of his time in doing something that he expects to have pay for outside of his salary.

Mr. EVARTS. Will the Senator allow me to ask on what evidence that rests?

Mr. PLUMB. This gentleman has been in the employ of the Government during this period of time, and if this was a proper thing to be done it was his duty to do it under the compensation which he has been receiving.

Mr. EVARTS. The point is that he performs his duties there during the whole hours for his salary, and all of this work has been done outside of those hours.

Mr. PLUMB. That is entirely incredible. It is well known, I think, and the Senator from New York himself during the period that he occupied the State Department probably had occasion to know, that the work of the Department is not very arduous, unless possibly in exceptional cases. I once had the responsibility of naming a clerk in one of the Departments in this city, a man who came from the West, a man of intellectual and physical ability, not extraordinary, however, certainly in a physical way. He was assigned to a desk in the Department in which he was appointed and given a certain amount of work to do, which he performed in about two hours. Thereupon, very naturally (and I say very naturally according to the standard which has been the custom outside the Departments), he inquired of his chief for something more to do. His chief said to him, "That was a day's work which you have done here in these two hours. You must accustom yourself to spread this work out over the entire working period of the day." Of course he was prompt to comply as far as possible, and yet it took a number of weeks to really get his muscles in a condition whereby he could move them slowly so as to get through in eight hours what, if he had been left to himself, under his disposition to do all that he ought to do, he could have done in two hours.

I simply do not believe on the testimony of anybody that any clerk in a Department of the Government has done work of this kind in over hours, having himself worked the entire period of eight hours, if that is the period which he should work in the Department for the Government. It has been done in hours of course at odd times, and when probably there was nothing else pressing to be done.

Mr. President, we employ the services of these people, and a man has no more right to do work of this kind, expecting to reap a compensation for it from the Government, than he has to patent an article for which the Government furnished him the material, and that the Court of Claims has recently decided could not legally be done.

Of course the Senator from New York is not here to say that this is a legal claim, but I say it is not a moral claim. On the contrary, the purchase of this manuscript would involve us constantly in things of the same kind, by which we are inducing the servants of the public, as we call them, to be inventing ways whereby they can disregard the public duties and engage in private speculations which some day they will expect to unload upon the Government.

I do not question the value of this work. The Secretary of State knows about that, and I am willing to take his judgment of it. I have no doubt an entire diary of the State Department, giving the habits of the various Secretaries and all that sort of thing from the beginning of the Government, would be interesting, and it would take the place no doubt of some of the celebrated memoirs of former generations. But apart from the value of the work itself I simply say that this is a bad precedent.

Mr. EVARTS. The Senator from Kansas seems to think that this is a personal narrative of the Secretaries of State. The work is a chronological history of the Department of State and the foreign relations of the United States from the time of the organization of the first Colonial Congress, in September, 1774, down to the present time.

I did not catch the name of the employé, if his name was uttered, who could do in two hours more than anybody else had been able to do before in a day. Perhaps the Senator did not name him. But I can say that the State Department is not overfurnished with employés; that no such imputation has ever been made; and that patronage has scarcely any play in the conduct of affairs there—no more under the present Administration than under previous administrations.

We are brought distinctly to the proposition that this is a valuable work; that if the Government suffers for the want of the work it will be its injury; that nobody but inmates of that Department could make this work; that this is an honorable and excellent gentleman, about whom all agree who have had to do with him; and that successive Secretaries of State pronounce the work useful to us.

Now, it is said, upon generalities, that people are idle; that this work could be done during office hours; and the Senator can not believe on any statement that anybody in the employment of the State Department is really worked. Of course I can interpose on a question of fact nothing that will be additional to what is certified by the Secretaries of State. But the Government is either to have this work or go without it, and I much regret that the name of Mr. Haswell, who is so well known to all who have to do with the State Department, should be made the occasion of aspersions of idleness.

I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. EVARTS. On page 115, after line 15, I move to insert:

To provide for the laying out and constructing a macadamized roadway or carriage drive through the grounds of the Botanical Garden of the United States, under the supervision and direction of Col. John M. Wilson, Commissioner of Public Buildings, the sum of $4,800.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. EVARTS. This is a report from the Library Committee, and so far as I know, the desirability of having this driveway extended through the Botanical Garden is generally admitted. I desired from the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Clark, his estimate, which he carefully made, of what it might cost, and the sum named in the amendment is that named by him. Everybody in the Senate is as familiar with the situation and with the reasons why this improvement should be made as I can be or can be supposed to be.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations considered this amendment and refused to insert it. I was one of those opposed to it in the committee, and I am opposed to it now. We are laying off carriage drives for gentlemen all over this city. We are improving the Potomac flats, at a cost of several million dollars, where they can drive ad libitum over miles of roadway. They have the Soldiers' Home; they have all the great parks; and here is a little botanical garden, where people can walk between the Capitol and Third street, and they want now to invade that with their carriage drives. I do not think it ought to be done. It will involve tearing up the two rows of trees that grow from one gate to the other; and I have never been able to see any sort of necessity for it.

The persons who use carriages have plenty of places to drive, and when there is one little place where people can go and walk and take their children and not be run over by the carriages of the distinguished gentlemen who want to drive through it, it is sought to invade that place and get in there, too. That, it seems to me, is really going too far. There ought to be some place where people can go without being liable to be run over by the gentlemen in carriages.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Is it proposed to make a drive through the Botanical Garden?

Mr. BECK. Yes; through the center of it, tearing away the rows of trees so as to make a carriage drive. That is the proposition of the Committee on the Library. Our Committee on Appropriations do not agree to it. Of course the Committee on the Library can do pretty much as they please.

We have just inserted $32,000 to finish the monument at Newburgh.

Everything is done on a grand scale that comes from the Committee on the Library. When my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] rose, I thought he was going to oppose that amendment, and I looked with perfect amazement when he came out advocating it more earnestly than anybody else, and of course I had no right to say a word on the subject after that. There is a monument which we made a contract to build for $25,000. A joint committee of the two Houses was appointed. Secretary Bayard, then a Senator, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], then a member of the House, were selected out of the joint committee to make the contract, and they bargained for $25,000. We have paid that $25,000. Now, it takes $20,000 more to put in some beautiful little statuettes inside, as there were some places left where they could be conveniently put. I thought perhaps we could do that. Not content with that, the Committee on the Library wanted $12,000 for four gates.

There are not ten farmers in any county in Kentucky who would not be glad to get $3,000 to build them a house on 500 acres of land, and yet we have authorized four gates at $3,000 a gate, that we were never under any obligation to place there, and I suppose gates could be put there for $500. Then we are to put a watchman there and give him $500 this year. Next year he will complain and the Library Committee will report that other watchmen get $1,000 and this watchman must get $1,000 too, and he will be maintained there as long as time lasts. And now we are to have the Botanical Garden invaded, and the walk that people can take through there without being run over by carriages is to be broken up.

There is no end to the drives in this city; there is no end to the expenditure that has been made to enable gentlemen to drive; but there is a little corner where they can not go through, where they think they would like to go through in coming to the beautiful monument that is standing weeping over our extravagance at the foot of the Capitol Grounds, and they must come through the center of the Botanical Garden because it is too much trouble to go around on either side of the garden. I hope the Senate will not agree to it. I believe I shall call for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment just to see whether it will or not.

Mr. EVARTS. This subject was brought to the attention of the Committee on the Library by other Senators, and it did not originate with that committee. But I have not before heard that there was any objection felt as to the impropriety of extending the drive from the public grounds, if it is right that that drive should have been provided, and bringing it into connection with the drives in the Capitol Park, which is all that is to be accomplished by opening this road in continuance of the drive through the other public grounds.

It does not interfere with the Botanical Garden in any other respect than the roadway which will occupy some portion of that inclosure. The gates can be preserved, to be closed at suitable hours, so that it would be open as a drive less freely than in the other public grounds.

I am sorry that the Senator from Kentucky should have thought it worth while to reproach the Committee on the Library for this expenditure by recurring to another item that has already been adopted without objection by the Senate, and that is for the monument at Newburgh.

I believe, as I understand the matter, there is a very general desire that the drive should not be interrupted and every person thus approaching the Capitol Park be diverted to a rumbling pavement at one end and the other of the Botanical Garden.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment. The Chair understands the Senator from Kentucky to ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BECK. I will take a division first.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 5, noes not counted.

Mr. EVARTS. On page 117, after line 2, I move to insert:

To enable the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the direction of the court, to obtain the oil portraits of John Rutledge, Oliver Ellsworth, and Morrison R. Waite, to be hung in the robing-room of the court with those of the other Chief-Justices already there, $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. On page 117, after line 2, following the amendment already accepted, I move to insert:

For the purchase of the 10,928½ pages of transcripts of state and historical papers of great value relating to the early history of the United States, taken and prepared by Mr. B. F. Stevens from the archives of England, France, Spain, and Holland, such purchase being recommended by the present Secretary of State and his predecessor, and the late United States minister to England, Mr. Lowell, the sum of $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. On page 117, after the amendments already agreed to, I move to insert:

To provide for the safe-keeping and preservation of such historical documents and papers as shall be presented to the Library of Congress or placed in its custody, the sum of $1,000.

Mr. BECK. I should like to know why that can not be done under the general arrangements we have.

Mr. EVARTS. I will make a few observations on the matter. This subject has been brought to the attention of the Committee on the Library by eminent men engaged in historical pursuits and in the preparation of valuable historical works. They have, of course, access to whatever is to be found in the stores of the public offices here. They may find them also in the States, in the protection given to and the collection of such historical papers in the States, and by voluntary associations, historical societies, antiquarian societies, etc. But all these investigators discover that there are distributed all over the old States and in the newer States by transportation from their original source valuable papers possessed by families, not always recognized or known of themselves as important until some search is made to discover some additional documentary evidence bearing upon our history.

The result of these examinations is that a great many persons having these documents would be willing to present them to the Government if they knew they would be cared for and properly arranged. Others, not willing to part with a family possession, would be glad to deposit them where they would be safe and would be useful.

It is supposed that when the new Library building is constructed a reasonable provision may be made in space and for the arrangement of the stores, if they shall increase; but until then the Committee on the Library were of the opinion that this appropriation should be made, after consultation with Mr. Spofford, who, we all know, is a hard-working man and does everything that can properly be done. He was of opinion that a provision of a thousand dollars would be all that he would require for the additional service which would be brought into requisition by this experiment.

I can not think that a thousand dollars for so salutary an object is to be objected to, even if it should turn out that it may not involve so much of necessity or of usefulness as is proposed. But my own judgment is in concurrence with the historical writers who brought the matter to my attention, that this is a very valuable provision, and will lead to the deposit and safe-keeping of works and documents that in every accidental fire in depositories dispersed through the States may, as year passes after year, deprive us of any such protection and safe-keeping.

I hope, therefore, the Senate will not object to this recommendation of the Library Committee to appropriate a thousand dollars for this purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. On page 117, to come in after the amendment just offered, I move to insert:

For the purchase of the unfinished painting by Benjamin West, of the Peace Commissioners at the Treaty of Paris, $1,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. EVARTS. This picture, which is in England, was brought to the attention of the Secretary of State by Mr. Lowell, then our minister. It is a historical painting as interesting as any scene of historical interest can present. It is a picture by Benjamin West, then in a position of great eminence in his art, of the conference of the British and American plenipotentiaries in the conclusion of the treaty of 1783. Unfortunately, it is an imperfect picture, as the only ones who are produced and preserved in the work of the artist are the American commissioners and one of the English. The space in the other portion of the conference-room is unoccupied by the English plenipotentiaries, so that this is an unfinished work of Mr. West.

Mr. Lowell commended its purchase as a reasonable one. It is now in the ownership of an English nobleman, who is willing to part with it on considerations that if the Government wants it it can have it at what, if he undertook to sell it at private sale, he could get, or he might get more.

The picture is a small one. We have a photograph of it which has been in the Library Committee room.

I have no more to say than that the subject is interesting. The artist was eminent. What has been preserved in portraits is valuable, and the picture can be procured, not at an extravagant price, nor indeed from any one who is seeking to dispose of it. If we should like to have it we can obtain it for $1,500. I hope, therefore, that the appropriation will be allowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS].

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 14, noes 18; no quorum voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is a further count demanded?

Mr. EVARTS. Not by me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair has announced a vote that shows no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has announced the vote, which discloses the want of a quorum. It is the duty of the Chair under the rule to direct the roll of the Senate to be called, unless by unanimous consent the rule be dispensed with to enable the Chair to count the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent that the Chair count the Senate in order to see if a quorum is present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection. [A pause.] There is a quorum present, as an actual count by the Chair discloses. The question will be again taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York. Does the Senator from New York desire to have the Senate again divided?

Mr. EVARTS. I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks that on the question of agreeing to the amendment proposed by him the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, this is a proposition to pay $1,500 for an unfinished picture.

Mr. EVARTS. It was left unfinished by the artist, Mr. West. It is a hundred years old. The work was unfinished in respect of the figures, but it includes all the American figures and one of the English.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is it?

Mr. EVARTS. It is in England, in the possession of Lord Belper.

Mr. BECK. Have we any information indicating to us that this picture is one so far advanced as to be anything like a likeness of the people it is intended to represent?

Mr. EVARTS. Certainly; it is a very good likeness of the Americans, Mr. Laurens, Mr. Jay, Mr. Adams, and Dr. Franklin.

Mr. BECK. We have been buying a great many pictures and some that are rather worthless ones. There is one hanging up in the Capitol now, called "Farming in the Northwest," 20 feet or 30 feet long. I do not know what we paid for it, but it is not worth a penny. It is no more like farming in the Northwest than farming in the moon. We do not know what farming in the moon is like, but there it is; and now we are going into the purchase of an unfinished picture, and I suppose we shall give somebody ten times what the picture is worth, and hang it up in the Library building when we finish it and get somebody else to tell whom it represents. It seems to me we are going a great deal too far when we are hunting up unfinished pictures to spend our money upon.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this is a picture by one of the most famous artists of his day, and it is especially interesting to us from the fact that he was a native American, an artist who was famous for the accuracy of his portraiture, Benjamin West. He painted the royal family. Though a man of humble origin, I think, here, he raised himself by his genius to a very high social position in England, as well as in his profession. He was president of the Royal Academy. He was the favorite of George the Third, and he was a man whose patriotic American spirit never failed, although he was a dweller in England. At the close of the war he exhibited to King George the Third a picture in which he put the stars and stripes on an American ship. The King was at first inclined to be much offended, but on second thought his own royal spirit came to him and he told West that he was right, and that he liked him for his courage and independence.

This particular picture, made by this great artist, is a picture of one of the two or three greatest events in American history, the signing of the treaty of peace of 1783. It represents four of the very greatest Americans, and as far as it is completed it is an original portraiture of John Adams, John Jay, Benjamin Franklin, and that most gallant and most unfortunate of our patriots of the Revolution, Henry Laurens, of South Carolina, who spent, as is well known, some years during the Revolutionary war as a prisoner in the Tower.

I suppose there are twenty societies in this country in our principal cities (I can vouch certainly for two that I now think of) who would greedily purchase this picture at a price much larger than that which is asked for it; but the person into whose possession it came thought it was fitting first to offer it to the Government, to which it ought to belong.

I agree with the honorable Senator from Kentucky that there has been some extravagance and some bad judgment in the matter of purchasing the works of art with which we have undertaken to adorn this Capitol. Sometimes we have been, all of us, more or less influenced by a certain sympathy for the artist. Sometimes the artist has been a woman. I think as much of that mistake has come from the neighborhood of the honorable Senator from Kentucky as from any other part of the Senate Chamber. I think that Senator is quite as likely to respond to an appeal from a person in distress, or a woman, an artist who has some peculiar claim to sympathy, as in the case of the eminent artist who has now a picture before us, coming from his own State. I think that Senator is quite as likely to yield to those emotions which are generous and commendable as any member of the Library Committee.

But whatever mistakes we may have made in that way have nothing to do with the particular question which is before the Senate. Is there anybody here who, if he were undertaking to adorn an elegant private mansion, and had offered to him this painting, which though unfinished yet is still so far finished as to have an admirable portraiture of these gentlemen, would not think he was fortunate if he could acquire an original picture of John Jay, Henry Laurens, Benjamin Franklin, and John Adams engaged in this great and conspicuous work of their lives, for the small sum of $1,500?

Mr. BECK. Has any member of the Library Committee seen this picture?

Mr. HOAR. They have seen photographs of it.

Mr. EVARTS. We have photographs of it.

Mr. BECK. But the original picture has never been seen by any member of that committee?

Mr. EVARTS. The picture is in the possession of Lord Belper, in England, and of course is not offered here for sale in any proper sense. Mr. Lowell saw it in Lord Belper's collection.

Mr. BECK. Then we are acting upon the judgment of Mr. Lowell, and not upon the judgment of any member of the Committee on the Library?

Mr. EVARTS. We have the representation, first, of the reputation of Mr. West; second, Mr. Lowell's examination of the picture and his recommendation of it; and, third, a photograph, which is a well-taken representation of the portraits. We never can get any nearer to it than we are now. It will not be brought over here for anybody to look at that I know of. Mr. Bayard has the photograph, which gentlemen can see, and it is a true photograph of the picture, like photographs of pictures we have now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not an exact photograph of the picture as it actually looks?

Mr. EVARTS. Yes, it is, exactly. It is spoken of here as if the photograph did not give us any idea of what the picture is. It gives us every idea of what the picture is, and when there is superadded to it that the artist was a man of genius and of fame, and that the occasion of the group was most interesting to us, and these great Americans are preserved there in life portraits, then you have everything that can be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How do you know about the authenticity of the picture?

Mr. EVARTS. The authenticity is not to be doubted anywhere.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has Mr. Lowell examined the picture?

Mr. EVARTS. He has examined it and recommended it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the evidences of the authenticity of the picture?

Mr. EVARTS. Let me read what Mr. Lowell says in a letter from Mr. Bayard, addressed to me, as chairman of the Committee on the Library:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 28, 1887.

DEAR SIR: A photograph of an unfinished picture by Benjamin West, and containing the portraits of the three American commissioners for the treaty of Paris in 1783, was sent me a few weeks ago by Mr. Lowell, from whose note I transcribed the following:

"I send you through the legation bag a photograph of an unfinished picture, by West, containing the portraits of our commissioners for the treaty of Paris. The unfinished half was to contain the English members of the commission. The faces, as you will see, are finished, and the figures more or less so. I have seen the picture and thought it a very interesting one. The three who are seated are Adams, Franklin, and Laurens. I forget who those standing are, but one of them, I think, is Oswald. Lord Belper, who owns the picture, knows who they are.

Jay was the fourth, whom Mr. Lowell could not identify. Any one familiar with the features of Chief-Justice Jay sees at once that Chief-Justice Jay makes up the fourth. Mr. Lowell continues to say:

"Lord Belper is willing to sell it for £300, which does not appear to me high. I doubt if it would fetch that at auction, but am inclined to think he could get that or more at private sale. Its pedigree is clear. Indeed, no one familiar with West's pictures and sketches, as I happen to be, could question its authenticity."

Mr. Bayard then proceeds:

This photograph is now at this Department, and I shall be glad to submit it for your inspection.

As an authentic work by a native American artist, depicting an incident of such historical interest to Americans, I recommend that authority be given by Congress for the purchase of the original at a sum not to exceed that named by Mr. Lowell, £300, and shall be glad, if your committee approve the suggestion, if you will bring the matter to the attention of the Senate.

I informed the Secretary of State that the committee had decided to propose this amendment, and on the 22d of May, 1888, Mr. Bayard writes:

I learn with satisfaction by your note of the 10th instant that your committee will place upon the proper appropriation bill the sum ($1,500) requisite for the purchase of Benjamin West's unfinished picture of the American plenipotentiaries for the treaty of 1783.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the size of the photograph?

Mr. EVARTS. It is almost the size of one of these desks.

Mr. ALLISON. May I call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that in this bill we have appropriated $10,000 for the purchase of pictures, and that under it the Library Committee will be able to make this purchase? I think we had better let it rest on that appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think so.

Mr. EVARTS. The Library Committee, I suppose, is quite able to very usefully employ the fund of $10,000 which is in this bill so far, but may not appear when it leaves the other House. But it is not necessary to expend that $10,000 in advance. All purchases by the Library Committee are presumably, and actually I may say, more judicious and upon more protective inspection and judgment than purchases made under the bills that are introduced by different Senators and passed through naming the sums that are permitted to be paid. I do not like in advance to take this sum from the $10,000 when the Committee on Appropriations reduced the amount proposed by the Committee on the Library from $15,000 to $10,000. If the committee will restore the original amount I will withdraw this amendment. If, now, opposition is made to this, I ask that the yeas and nays be taken.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I paired yesterday for several days with the Senator from North Carolina who sits near me [Mr. RANSOM]. I do not know how he would vote on this, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. BROWN (when Mr. DOLPH'S name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], and as this seems to be a party question I withdraw my vote. I have already voted inadvertently in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote of the Senator from Georgia will be withdrawn.

Mr. EVARTS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], but on leaving the Senate this forenoon he told me he should be absent, and asked me to vote as I thought fit on these amendments. I will therefore vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but I see his colleague voted "nay," and I will therefore take the liberty to record my vote in the same way.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] announced a pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. The Senator from Minnesota has voted.

Mr. KENNA. The Senator from Minnesota was not in the Chamber when I made the announcement. I now vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired generally with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER], who is absent by reason of sickness; but on this question I am permitted to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. I do not know how he would vote if here. If he were here, I would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Allison,	Evarts,	Hiscock,	Sabin,
Blair,	Farwell,	Hoar,	Sherman,
Blodgett,	Frye,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Bowen,	Gibson,	Palmer,	Stewart,
Chandler,	Gray,	Plumb,	Teller.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Riddleberger,

NAYS—24.

Bate,	Edmunds,	Jones of Arkansas,	Reagan,
Beck,	George,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,
Berry,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Vest,
Brown,	Harris,	Pasco,	Walthall,
Cockrell,	Hearst,	Payne,	Wilson of Iowa,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.

ABSENT—29.

Aldrich,	Davis,	McPherson,	Stanford,
Blackburn,	Dawes,	Manderson,	Stockbridge,
Butler,	Dolph,	Morrill,	Turpie,
Call,	Eustis,	Paddock,	Vance,
Cameron,	Faulkner,	Platt,	Voorhees.
Chace,	Gorman,	Quay,
Colquitt,	Hale,	Ransom,
Daniel,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EVARTS. I offer an amendment to come in on page 117, after those adopted, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 117, after the amendments already agreed to, it is proposed to insert the following:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase the library of books, maps, and pamphlets left by Professor Arnold Guyot, the sum of $4,500.

Mr. EVARTS. I will say, Mr. President, that this is the library of the celebrated geographer and scientist, Mr. Guyot, which is offered in bulk for purchase for the Congressional Library. It was brought to our attention under the auspices of Miss Henry, the daughter of the celebrated head of our Smithsonian Institution, from her knowledge of the value of the works. Mr. Spofford examined it very carefully. It was offered at $6,000, and Mr. Spofford was of opinion that it was worth $6,000, but it contained many, or some, volumes that were duplicates of what we already had in the Library, and that therefore it was not for the Government to obtain the whole bulk of the library at that price. In it, he was of opinion, there were works that could not be easily obtained by the Government, and that the maps, which were also included in the purchase and which are numerous and valuable, could not easily be replaced if they should pass out of the opportunity of the Government now to obtain them.

The family of Mr. Guyot, on this representation, offered to take $4,500 in concession to the fact that a portion of the library is duplicated, and Mr. Spofford reports to the Committee on the Library thus:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, Washington, D. C., July 13, 1888.

The accompanying letter from Miss Henry offers to give the Guyot collection of books, maps, and pamphlets to the Government at the sum of $4,500, as she has been induced to make this reduction from the original price of $6,000 by the consideration that there are a good many duplicates of works already in the Library of Congress.

Under the circumstances, as there are many maps in the collection which are very rare, and our collection of works in geography and cartography is in much need of enlargement, I think the sum of $4,500 reasonable for so rare and in some respects unique collection.

Very respectfully,

A. R. SPOFFORD,
Librarian of Congress.

Hon. W. M. EVARTS,
Chairman of Joint Library Committee.

This opportunity to obtain this library will pass away if we do not now avail ourselves of it. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be allowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 26, noes 15.

Mr. GIBSON. I now offer an amendment to the pending bill, on page 22, line 18, after the word "Louisiana," to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 22, line 18, after the word "Louisiana," it is proposed to insert:

At Chicot Pass, and to mark a navigable channel along Grand Lake, Louisiana.

This is done, Mr. President, in accordance with a request of the Chief of the Light-House Board, Vice-Admiral S. C. Rowan, who, under date of July 31, 1888, writes as follows:

The board, therefore, has the honor to ask that the current sundry civil appropriation bill be amended by the insertion of the following words on page 22, line 18, after the word "Louisiana" and before the word "Mississippi," namely, "at Chicot Pass, and to mark a navigable channel along Grand Lake, Louisiana."

No further appropriation will be needed for the purpose, as the expense of maintaining these lights was included in the lump sum of the estimate and of the appropriation proposed, but it appears that if the omission of the above proposed words is not cured it may become necessary to put out the lights.

It is hardly necessary for me to add anything as to the reputation of the chairman of the Light-House Board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator forward his amendment in writing, so that it may be inserted by the clerks?

Mr. GIBSON. I will do so.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is not estimated for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be first reported at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment of Mr. GIBSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa raises the point of order on the proposed amendment that it is not estimated for by the head of any Department.

Mr. ALLISON. This appropriation for lighting rivers is regularly estimated for in the Book of Estimates, naming the rivers. Of course if we add one we must add another and another, until this entire appropriation bill will be very much enlarged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent, although the point of order is not debatable, the Chair will hear the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], if he desires to speak on the question.

Mr. GIBSON. This amendment was offered at the request of the president or chairman of the Light-House Board, and I suppose that it has had the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. It appears that these lights are at necessary and proper places, and I should think that the amendment would not be repugnant to the rule, or that it came within the rule that amendments should come from the head of a Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is compelled, under the rule, to hold that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. DANIEL. I offer an amendment to come in on page 9. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, after line 20, insert—

For extension of public building at Lynchburgh, Va., $30,000, upon plans and specifications to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DANIEL. I simply state that this has been recommended by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and that the report in the case shows that it is absolutely needed for public accommodation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. DANIEL. Let us have a division.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. DANIEL.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 14 (less than a quorum voting in the affirmative), noes not counted.

Mr. TELLER. I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill the following:

That the amount necessary to pay for the removal and subsistence of those members of the Eastern band of Cherokees who have removed themselves, as well as those who may now or hereafter desire to remove to the Cherokee Nation, in the Indian Territory, at the rate of $53.33 per head, being the amount specified in the eighth article of the Cherokee treaty of December 29, 1835, and the act of Congress approved July 29, 1848, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ALLISON. I will make the point of order on that amendment if I can. It is not estimated for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under what provision of the rule does the Senator interpose his point of order?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand it to be a claim. It is not an appropriation estimated for.

Mr. TELLER. I will say that this comes from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported favorably, and has been to the Committee on Appropriations for more than twenty-four hours.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that.

Mr. TELLER. It was estimated for in 1885. I do not suppose it has been estimated for since.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would not bring it within the rule.

Mr. TELLER. As I understand the rule, it is not necessary that it should be estimated for if it has been reported from a standing committee and referred to the Appropriations Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes it would be obnoxious to that part of the rule preventing the consideration of a private claim——

Mr. TELLER. This is not a private claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator pause a moment? The Chair supposes it would be obnoxious to that part of the rule preventing the consideration of a private claim unless it should be brought within the rule by a treaty stipulation referred to on the face of the amendment. If the Senator will forward to the Chair the clause of the treaty referred to, the Chair will examine it and ascertain whether it is in order or not.

Mr. TELLER. I will send up and let the Chair look at the report made by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not the time to read the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but will inspect the clause of the treaty if the Senator will forward it.

Mr. TELLER. Well, I do not know, Mr. President; it is not my place to state to the Chair exactly where the provision is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will then hold that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. TELLER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. TELLER. This, Mr. President, is an amendment to carry out existing treaties. It is not a private claim; it is to carry out a large number of treaties. It is manifestly impossible, on a question of order, that any Senator who offers an amendment of this kind can point the Chair to the several treaties, and it is not to be expected. It can not be done. I do not know that the Chair has to take judicial notice of what the treaties are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is only required to take notice of the rule.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose that the Senate is, at least, if the Chair is not.

We made a treaty with the Indians a great many years ago, in which we agreed to pay their expenses of removal to the Indian Territory. The Chair will find the treaty in the seventh volume of the Statutes, on page 482. The United States there agreed to remove these Indians west of the Mississippi, and the price fixed for the removal and one year's subsistence was at the rate of $53.33 per head. So that this is for the purpose of carrying out a treaty. I will call the attention of the Chair to the latter part of Rule XVI, which has been frequently cited in the Senate, and which the Chair, I suppose, has read, and which the Senate has read:

or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

Now, Mr. President, this has been moved by the direction of a standing committee—by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is to carry out existing law—a treaty. It has the approval of two Secre taries of the Interior. I do not know that there has been for the last year an estimate for it. It is not necessary that there should be, in order to bring it within the rule. I will ask to have the petition of the Indians read. Then the Senate can do just exactly what it pleases with it. It is not a matter of any concern of mine any more than it is that of any other Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Memorial in behalf of certain Cherokee Indians.

To the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, in behalf of those Cherokee Indians formerly residing in North Carolina who have recently removed, at their own expense, to the Cherokee country in the Indian Territory, as their duly accredited agent for that purpose, respectfully represents:

That prior to the year A. D. 1884, there were about three hundred and fifty Cherokee Indians, hitherto known as the North Carolina Cherokees, who, in order to avail themselves of the future home provided for all the Cherokee Indians by the treaties with the United States of A. D. 1835 and 1846, in the Indian Territory west of the Mississippi River, availed themselves of the provisions of the eighth article of said treaty and removed to that country at their own expense.

That the eighth article of said treaty of 1835 provides for such removal of the Cherokee Indians as follows:

"Such persons and families as, in the opinion of the emigrating agent, are capable of subsisting and removing themselves shall be permitted to do so; and they shall be allowed in full of all claims for the same $20 for each member of their family; and in lieu of their one year's rations they shall be paid the sum of $33.33 if they prefer it." (Rev. Ind. Treat., p. 70.)

That a large number of those Cherokees formerly residing east of the Mississippi River, who removed themselves to their country in the Indian Territory, and subsisted themselves for one year after their removal to their new homes, have heretofore made application to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to be paid their commutation money for their said removal and subsistence provided for by said eighth article of said treaty, which has not as yet been paid to them.

Your memorialist heretofore submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs the following communication in behalf of these claimants more than three years ago:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 2, 1885.

SIR: Please find inclosed a list of claims of North Carolina Cherokees, who have removed from North Carolina to the Indian Territory, for the cost of their removal and subsistence, under the eighth article of the treaty of December 29, 1835.

"The majority of these claims were filed in your office November 20, 1877, and the balance in March and April, 1878. The evidence in these cases is on file and they are ready for payment. I respectfully request that you call the attention of the Appropriation Committees of the Senate and House to these claims and recommend their early payment. The cost of removal and subsistence of a part of those who removed from North Carolina to the Indian Territory was paid out of the civilization fund, which fund was subsequently reimbursed by Congress, as I am informed, and justice and right call for the payment of these claims which have been pending for many years. Many of the claimants are poor and needy, and I sincerely trust that you will again call the attention of Congress to their claims.

"Very respectfully,

"J. M. BRYAN,
"Agent and Attorney of Claimants.

"Hon. HIRAM PRICE,
"Commissioner of Indian Affairs."

Whereupon the Commissioner, Hon. Hiram Price, communicated to the Secretary of the Interior the following report and recommendation for the payment of these claimants:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
"Washington, February 6, 1885.

"SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a copy of a communication, dated Washington, D. C., January 2, 1885, from J. M. Bryan, agent and attorney for Cherokees, requesting that the attention of the Appropriation Committees of House and Senate be invited to the claims of certain Cherokees, in order to secure for them the removal and subsistence money they are entitled to receive under the provisions of the treaties of 1835, 1836, 1846, and an act of Congress approved July 29, 1848 (9 Stats., page 264).

"By the eighth article of the New Echota treaty of December 29, 1835, with the Cherokees (7 Stats., page 482), the United States agreed to remove these Indians West, the price for removal being fixed at $20, and one year's subsistence at $33.33 for each of such persons, who might prefer to remove themselves.

"By the third article of the supplementary treaty of March 1, 1836 (7 Stats., page 488), the sum of $600,000 was allowed to the Cherokees, in lieu of all claims of every nature and description against the United States, including the expenses of their removal.

"By the eleventh article of the treaty of August 6, 1846 (9 Stats., page 873), the question whether the amount expended for the one year's subsistence should be paid out of Government or Cherokee funds was submitted to the Senate for decision, as also the question, if the Cherokees were to pay, whether the subsistence should be charged at a greater rate than $33.33 per head.

"The fourth section of the act of July 29, 1848 (9 Stats., 264), directed the Secretary of War to ascertain the number of Indians remaining at the ratification of the New Echota treaty (May 23, 1836), and the Secretary of the Treasury to set apart a sum equal to $53.33 for each individual reported by the Secretary of War, upon which interest was to be paid at 6 per cent. per annum, on such per capita.

"The fifth section provided for the payment of the $53.33 for the removal and subsistence of such individual members as might thereafter desire to remove, upon their removal west, which amount was to be charged to the general Cherokee fund, and reimbursed therefrom.

"This fund, under the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stats., 447), was applied for the education, improvement, and civilization of these Indians, after certain specific acts and payments had been effected, and, under the act of August 15, 1876 (19 Stats., 197), the balance of this fund, after certain payments therefrom, was placed to their credit upon the books of the Treasury Department, to bear interest at 5 per cent. per annum; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to use annually, for agricultural implements and for educational purposes among said Indians, so much of the principal of said fund as with the interest annually accruing thereon shall amount to $6,000.

"In view of the fact that Congress has determined the uses to which this fund must be applied, and the Indians are without means for their removal, I am of the opinion that Congress should furnish the necessary means to enable the Department to effect their removal as stipulated in the eighth article of their treaty of 1835.

"I therefore respectfully recommend that Congress be requested to appropriate, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the cost of the removal and subsistence of those members of the tribe who have removed, as well as those who may hereafter desire to remove, at the rate of $53.33 per head.

"I inclose herewith a draught of an amendment to be incorporated in the deficiency or sundry civil bill hereafter to be acted upon by Congress.

"Very respectfully,

"H. PRICE, Commissioner.

"The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

"ESTIMATE.

"For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the removal and subsistence expenses of those members of the Eastern band of Cherokees who have removed, as well as for those who may hereafter desire to remove, to the Cherokee country, Indian Territory, at the rate of $53.33 per head: Provided, That the sum of $2,930.50, expended for the removal of one hundred and sixty-one members of said band in 1881, be deducted per capita from the $53.33 for each individual, being the amount specified in the eighth article of the treaty of December 29, 1835, $20,000."

This recommendation was transmitted by Secretary Teller, through the President, to Congress on February 7, 1885. (House Ex. Doc. No. 208, second session, Forty-eighth Congress.)

Your memorialists afterwards, in January, 1886, addressed the following communication to the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., January 20, 1886.

"SIR: I respectfully beg leave to call your attention to a claim of North Carolina Cherokees, who removed from North Carolina to the Cherokee Nation, Indian Territory, about ten years ago.

"The list of these claimants that I am representing is on file in the Indian Department, and every claim fully proven, as to number of persons and date of removal.

"The claim is for their removal and subsistence for one year.

"Under Cherokee treaty of 1846 provision is made that on all moneys due the Cherokees the United States Government agrees to pay 5 per cent. interest from the 12th of June, 1838.

"Therefore we think it is reasonable and just that these claimants should receive interest on the several sums due them from the date of their removal west, as it was their own funds placed in the hands of the United States Government for this special purpose, and to draw interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

"It has been near nine years since these claims have been presented to the Government for payment.

"I also submit a report from the Interior Department, dated February 10, 1885, for your information, on these claims, and I respectfully ask that you will have their money appropriated and paid.

"Very respectfully,

"J. M. BRYAN, For Claimants.

"Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
"Commissioner Indian Affairs."

Thereupon Commissioner Atkins made and submitted to Secretary Lamar the following report and recommendation in respect to these payments:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
"Washington, February 20, 1886.

"SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a copy of a communication, dated Washington, D. C., January 20, 1886, from J. M. Bryan, attorney, inviting attention to certain claims of North Carolina Cherokees for removal and subsistence money they are entitled to receive under the provisions of the treaties of 1835, 1836, 1846, and an act of Congress approved July 29, 1848 (9 Stats., page 264).

"By the eighth article of the New Echota treaty of December 29, 1835, with the Cherokees (7 Stats., page 482), the United States agreed to remove these Indians west, the price for removal being fixed at $20 and one year's subsistence at $33.33 for each of such persons who might prefer to remove themselves.

"By the third article of the supplementary treaty of March 1, 1836 (7 Stats., page 488), the sum of $600,000 was allowed to the Cherokees in lieu of all claims of every nature and description against the United States, including the expenses of their removal.

"By the eleventh article of the treaty of August 6, 1846 (9 Stats., page 873), the question whether the amount expended for the one year's subsistence should be paid out of Government or Cherokee funds was submitted to the Senate for decision, as also the question if the Cherokees were to pay, whether the subsistence should be charged at a greater rate than $33.33 per head.

"The fourth section of the act of July 29, 1848 (9 Stats., 264), directed the Secretary of War to ascertain the number of Indians remaining at the ratification of the New Echota treaty, May 23, 1836, and the Secretary of the Treasury to set apart a sum equal to $53.33 for each individual reported by the Secretary of War, upon which interest was to be paid at 6 per cent. per annum on such per capita.

"The fifth section provided for the payment of the $53.33 for the removal and subsistence of such individual members as might thereafter desire to remove upon their removal west, which amount was to be charged to the general Cherokee fund and reimbursed therefrom.

"This fund, under the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stats., 447), was applied for the education, improvement, and civilization of these Indians, after certain specific acts and payments had been effected, and under the act of August 15, 1876 (19 Stats., 197), the balance of this fund, after certain payments therefrom, was placed to their credit upon the books of the Treasury Department, to bear interest at 5 per cent. per annum, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to use annually, for agricultural implements and for educational purposes among said Indians, so much of the principal of said fund as, with the interest annually accumulating thereon, shall amount to $6,000.

"In view of the fact that Congress has determined the uses to which this fund must be applied, and the Indians are without means for their removal, I am of the opinion that Congress should furnish the necessary means to enable the Department to effect their removal, as stipulated in the eighth article of their treaty of 1835.

"I therefore respectfully recommend that Congress be requested to appropriate, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the cost of the removal and subsistence of those members of the tribe who have removed, as well as those who may now or hereafter desire to remove, at the rate of $53.33 per head.

"I inclose herewith a draught of a bill covering the amount required to carry out the objects specified.

"Very respectfully,

"J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

"Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR."

"A bill for the removal of the Eastern Cherokee Indians to the Indian Territory.

"Be it enacted, etc., That for the amount necessary to pay for the removal and subsistence of those members of the Eastern band of Cherokees who have removed themselves, as well as those who may now or hereafter desire to remove to the Cherokee Nation, in the Indian Territory, at the rate of $53.33 per head, being the amount specified in the eighth article of the Cherokee treaty of December 29, 1835, and the act of Congress approved July 29, 1848, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior."

This report and recommendation was transmitted to Congress by Secretary Lamar February 25, 1886 (Senate Executive Document No. 84, first session Forty-ninth Congress).

Your memorialist further represents that many of these Cherokees removed as far back as A. D. 1871 and 1872; they have, therefore, been kept out of their money expended by them respectively in their removal and subsistence all this time, although their applications asking to be paid this commutation money have been on file for several years with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs with the result aforesaid.

Your memorialist also represents that he is informed and believes that, as the payments asked for by these Indians are provided for by the treaty stipulation aforesaid, an appropriation therefore is authorized by law.

Wherefore, in their behalf as their agent and attorney, your memorialist prays that, for the purpose of paying for the removal and subsistence expenses of those members of the Eastern band of Cherokees who have removed, as well as for those who may desire to remove to the Cherokee country, Indian Territory, at the rate of $53.33 per head, there be inserted a clause in some appropriate appropriation bill at the present session of Congress, appropriating the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, as in duty bound he will ever pray.

J. M. BRYAN,
Agent and Attorney for Claimants.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, the ruling of the Chair in this case is clearly right. While it would be impossible for me to attempt to give the Senate all the facts that are involved in this case, I think that in a minute or two I can show the Senate enough to satisfy any one that the ruling of the Chair is exactly proper.

This is not based on any treaty. This claim is not to carry out any treaty, but, on the contrary, is directly in the face of the treaty made time and time again between the Cherokee Indians and the United States.

A committee of the Senate in 1850 in reporting upon a case parallel to this, arising under the treaty of 1846, which of itself grew out of the treaty of 1835, made a report to this Senate, in which they used this language:

The whole history of the negotiation of this treaty shows that the $5,000,000 was the maximum sum which the United States was to agree to pay, and that this was not so much a consideration for the lands and possessions of the Indians as an indemnity to cover the necessary sacrifices and losses of the surrender of one country and the removal to another.

Mr. TELLER. What did the Senator read that from? I did not catch it.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. From a report of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs of August 8, 1850. It was discussing the question referred to Congress for an appropriation on the finding of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs under Article IV of the treaty of 1846.

This particular clause that I have read about relates back to the treaty of 1835, in which the Government of the United States agreed to pay the Cherokees $5,000,000 for their lands and for their removal West, as the Government understood it, and as the agents of the Government reported. The Cherokees claimed afterwards that it was not the intention of the Government that they should bear the expenses of their removal West, but that the Government should pay them. For the purpose of avoiding any difficulty, the Government, in 1836, appropriated $600,000 to remove these people West, and that was to include the expense of their removal and all claims of every nature and description against the Government of the United States.

The terms made by agreement were that the $600,000 should be added to the $5,000,000 given in 1836, the Government thus yielding to the demands of the Indians that the $5,000,000 was not intended to include the expense of removal, and adding the $600,000, which was to remove them and to cover every demand that the Indians had against the Government. But even after that agreement was made only a handful of Indians went West. They made additional demands on the Government so that other appropriations should be made. In 1838, two years afterwards, the Government appropriated $1,047,067 for the removal of those Indians. After that 2,495 Indians went West, but part of them did not go, and they claimed that the Government construction of this agreement was not a correct one, and insisted on having another treaty, which was the treaty of 1846.

Under that treaty there is a direct and specific agreement for the ascertaining of what was fair between the Indians and the Government—this question especially of removing West. This had been included in both treaties, but it came up again in 1850. On that the committee reported, and on that the Government made an additional appropriation of $887,480.15.

While the Government agreed in 1835 to give the Indians the magnificent country that they occupy West, in lieu of the country that they then occupied on this side of the Mississippi River, and at the same time agreed to pay them $5,000,000, which was intended on the part of the Government to pay all the expenses of their removal, they receded from their agreement, insisting on having it gone over again. They succeeded on three several occasions in having three additional amounts, until they have been paid altogether $2,534,547.15 on this account, in which they were not entitled to one cent, not a single, solitary nickel.

This claim comes in now for an additional payment for the removal of other Indians. After the Government did all that it was entitled to do, and paid $2,500,000 to these Indians, not one cent of which it was under any moral or legal obligation to pay, these people come in here again.

This claim, I would also say, Mr. President, is a mere bagatelle compared with the other claims that are just as legal and equitable and which have as good foundation as this, that have not come in, but will come in if Congress yields step by step—will come in one after another for an appropriation. This is a question that ought to be carefully looked into by the Senate. If there is a dollar due these Indians it ought to be paid, but I submit that this is no way to settle a question of so much importance.

There is on the Calendar another proposition to pay this band of Cherokees another amount.

Mr. TELLER. It does not include this matter at all.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I know that; but it is on the same footing. I do not believe that the Senate will ever pay a dollar of it after it has been fully investigated and understood.

It seems to me that I have now shown enough, without going any further into details, to satisfy the Senate that this is not for the purpose of carrying out any treaty stipulation, and it can not under any circumstances be held that the ruling of the Chair is erroneous.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator says there is another large claim of these Indians pending which he does not suppose will ever be paid. I think very likely the Senator is correct about that. There are many claims pending under treaties that never will be paid, I presume. The other claim referred to by the Senator from Arkansas went through the Interior Department under a provision of Congress requiring that Department to inquire into the claim and determine whether it was due to the Indians or not. The Department passed upon it and determined that it was due. It then went to the Court of Claims and the Court of Claims decided that it was due. I think it ought to go on an appropriation bill, but it is too large, undoubtedly, to go on this bill, amounting as it does to three or more millions of dollars. I presume that when it comes here, the Indians not having any representative here, it will very likely be defeated in the Senate, as it is possible this amendment may be.

It is true that Congress made a very liberal appropriation for those people who were to go to the Indian Territory. All of them did not go. The money was exhausted. Exactly where it went it is not worth while to inquire. The Indians did not all go out. There was enough, probably, to cover the expenses of all of them if they had all gone, but they did not go; and as they went from time to time Congress furnished more money to pay their expenses. Some of them still remain—some that have not gone yet. It has been the policy of the Government to get them to go there. Everybody wants them to go. It has been the desire of the people of North Carolina that they should go.

From time to time these appropriations were made just as the Senator from Arkansas has said. The last appropriation left some money in the hands of the Department that could have been applied to this; but in 1875, on the theory that no more of them would go—although there had been some of them already gone that had never been paid (between 1871 and 1875 some had gone that never were paid)—but on the theory that they were not going, perhaps, Congress appropriated this sum for another purpose, therefore rendering it impossible for the Department to send them there—to pay those who had gone or to pay those who should go thereafter. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the 6th of February, 1885, says:

This fund, under the act of March 3, 1875, was applied for the education, improvement, and civilization of these Indians, after certain specific acts and payments had been effected under the act of August 15, 1876.

There was a diversion of this money. He goes on further, and concludes:

In view of the fact that Congress has determined the uses to which this fund must be applied, and the Indians are without means for their removal, I am of the opinion that Congress should furnish the necessary means to enable the Department to effect their removal, as stipulated in the eighth article of their treaty of 1835.

The eighth article of the treaty of 1835 provided that they should have this amount of money whenever they went. The late Commissioner continues:

I therefore respectfully recommend that Congress be requested to appropriate, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the cost of the removal and subsistence of those members of the tribe who have removed, as well as those who may hereafter desire to remove, at the rate of $53.33 per head.

When this matter was referred to Mr. Atkins, February 20, 1886, he uses almost the same language—that he respectfully recommends that there be appropriated—out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The Senator from Arkansas says that this matter ought to be examined. There is nothing that has been better examined anywhere than this claim that this tribe make that they are entitled under the treaty of 1835 to this payment. It may be that there has been enough money appropriated, but nobody claims that the moneys have been paid out in accordance with the provisions of the treaty. It seems to me that this provision is a reasonable one, for the Department to carry out existing treaties, and that it ought to be appropriated for.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. TELLER. Why, Mr. President, I had not yielded the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I supposed the Senator was through.

Mr. TELLER. The anxiety of the Senator to prevent any proper elucidation of this subject seems to be very great. I do not know, however, that I can say anything more on the subject than I have said.

Mr. HARRIS. I repeat that I beg the Senator's pardon. When I come to get the floor myself I shall again move to lay the appeal on the table, where it ought to go.

Mr. TELLER. I am quite willing that the Senator may do that. I believe I am willing that he may do it now, because I understand, Mr. President, that it is perfectly impossible to secure a prompt and proper compliance by Congress with treaties with Indians. For many years there has been no practical, actual pretense that this is done. I do not believe, myself, it is necessary to do it unless it is for the interest of the Indians, but I believe that when there is a plain statutory provision, a plain law of the land, under which these Indians have acted, they are entitled to their money as much as any man who holds a United States bond, and a great deal more.

This amendment, Mr. President, is in order. It is to carry out existing law. It is not a private claim. It has been before the proper committee. It has been before the Department. It is in no sense a claim by which there can be any danger that the Government will pay that which it does not owe, and, so far, nobody pretends that the Government does not owe it. The Government will have the opportunity, through its own agents, through its own Department, through its own machinery, to determine who has gone there and who is entitled to this money and who not. Now, if the Senator from Tennessee desires to move to lay this amendment on the table, he will have an opportunity of doing so.

Mr. HARRIS. I believe I have the floor now in my own right. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. TELLER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] moves to lay the appeal on the table, on which motion the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] asks that the yeas and nays may be recorded on the Journal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Chair kindly state what the decision of the Chair was from which the appeal was taken?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The decision of the Chair was that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado, which will be read if the Senator desires——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand what the amendment was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The decision of the Chair was that that amendment was not in order, upon the ground that it was a private claim, and was not provided for in a treaty.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PASCO. If it is necessary in order to have a quorum, I will vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Allison,	Coke,	Hampton,	Pugh,
Bate,	Colquitt,	Harris,	Reagan,
Beck,	Cullom,	Hawley,	Riddleberger,
Berry,	Daniel,	Jones of Arkansas,	Sherman,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Mitchell,	Walthall,
Blodgett,	George,	Pasco,	Wilson of Iowa,
Brown,	Gibson,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.
Cockrell,	Gray,	Plumb,

NAYS—8.

Call,	Palmer,	Sawyer,	Stockbridge,
Frye,	Platt,	Stewart,	Teller.

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Eustis,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	Kenna,	Spooner,
Bowen,	Farwell,	McPherson,	Stanford,
Butler,	Faulkner,	Manderson,	Turpie,
Cameron,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Vance,
Chace,	Hale,	Morrill,	Vest,
Chandler,	Hearst,	Paddock,	Voorhees.
Davis,	Hiscock,	Quay,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Ransom,
Dolph,	Ingalls,	Sabin.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments to the bill in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. ALLISON. On page 55, lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, I move to strike out the words:

This appropriation shall be disbursed by the Secretary of the Interior as provided by the act authorizing the construction of said building, approved April 15, 1886.

I desire to make a brief explanation of this amendment. This clause relates to the prosecution of the work on the Library building. I shall be obliged to ask unanimous consent to do this, as the clause to be modified is part of an amendment already agreed to. I hope there will be no objection to it. Under the amendment originally proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, the money is to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Interior. Section 1153 of the Revised Statutes provides:

It shall be the duty of the engineer superintending the construction of a fortification, or engaged about the execution of any other public work, to disburse the moneys applicable to the same; but no compensation shall be allowed him for such disbursement.

Mr. BECK. All you have to do is to strike out the words indicated.

Mr. ALLISON. The object is to place the amount of this appropriation under the immediate control of the engineer officer making the expenditure, as is the rule in all cases of this character. I hope there will be no objection to striking out those words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 55, line 6, after the word "therewith" it is proposed to strike out all down to and including "1886" in line 9, as follows:

This appropriation shall be disbursed by the Secretary of the Interior as provided by the act authorizing the construction of said building, approved April 15, 1886.

Mr. TELLER. I do not intend to object to the amendment proposed, but I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the section read does not have anything to do with this kind of case. That refers entirely to the officer's duty as an engineer. This is where you put an additional burden upon him.

Mr. ALLISON. I will propose an additional amendment to make that entirely plain after the pending amendment is agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 55, line 3, I move to insert, after the word "expended," the words "and disbursed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer an amendment, on page 57, lines 14 and 15, to strike out "clerk-hire, rent, and other."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 57, in lines 14 and 15, it is moved to strike out the words "clerk-hire, rent, and other;" so as to read:

Contingent expenses of land offices: For incidental expenses of the several land offices, $155,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I offer an amendment at page 10, after line 2. I ask that it be read, and I desire to make a brief explanation of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

Purchase of lots 11 and 12, square 689, Washington: For the purchase of lots and buildings thereon, being lots Nos. 11 and 12 of the subdivision of square numbered 689, on the original plat of lands of the city of Washington, bounded north by South B street, east by New Jersey avenue, west by South Capitol street, $277,692; this sum being the amount of the appraisement of said land and buildings made under the authority of provisions of the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1887.

Mr. ALLISON. This contemplates the purchase of the ground known as the Butler property, south of the Capitol. It contains 12,000 square feet and has on it a substantial building——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Only 12,000 square feet?

Mr. ALLISON. Twelve thousand square feet, I believe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There must be more than that a great deal.

Mr. ALLISON. Twelve thousand one hundred and thirty-one square feet of land, independent of the parking and streets, and the buildings thereon.

The building to which I have alluded is now occupied in part, and has been for many years, by the Coast Survey. We are paying for it a rental of $6,000 per annum. The front building is now occupied by committees of the House of Representatives. The center building—there are three buildings—is not occupied or leased by the Government. There is a considerable amount of vacant space not now built upon. The Senate Committee on Appropriations have believed for some time that it was a judicious thing to buy this property, and reported in favor of it two years ago. Instead of making the purchase, the House of Representatives insisted that we should have first an appraisal of the property to ascertain whether or not it was of the value claimed by General Butler. So we inserted in the sundry civil act of March 3, 1887, a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to direct an appraisement of this property. It was appraised at the sum of $277,692. The Committee on Appropriations believe that under existing circumstances it is a wise and judicious thing to purchase this property; and with that statement I leave the matter to the Senate.

The buildings are occupied now in part by the Government, and we are paying, I believe, $7,800 rental to General Butler for a portion of this property.

Mr. EDMUNDS. For less than 12,000 square feet of ground?

Mr. DAWES. It ought to be added that, besides the regular rental that we are paying, the House of Representatives is also paying for committee-rooms there at this moment quite a large sum of money in the way of rental.

Mr. ALLISON. I included that in the statement I made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand that the sum is $277,000?

Mr. ALLISON. Two hundred and seventy-seven thousand six hundred and ninety-two dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that it is proposed that the United States Treasury shall pay $277,692 for about 12,000 square feet of ground with a good stone building on it, which I think it is if it is a stone one? I say, with great respect to everybody else, that it is five times more than it is worth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. ALLISON. The positive and direct statement of the Senator from Vermont——

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is only an opinion of mine.

Mr. ALLISON. I know, but it shakes my faith in all our examinations. There must be an extraordinary mistake somewhere if the Senator from Vermont is correct in saying that we are paying five times too much for these three great buildings at the southwest corner of New Jersey avenue and B street, having a frontage, I believe, of 84 feet and extending back to the other street, one of them a fire-proof building, erected and made fire-proof in every respect, and for which we pay $6,000 a year rental. For one building we pay $6,000 a year—for one-third of the property.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am correct in saying that my opinion is as I stated, if the quantity of ground is that represented by the Senator from the paper he has read, of about 12,000 square feet, which is not twice as much as the ground of the House I live in and the house the Senator lives in. There is a mistake about it somewhere. It is impossible that any 12,000 square feet of land, if it was covered with gold dust, I was going to say, could be worth any $277,000.

Mr. BECK. I do not know the number of square feet in this property, but there are three large houses on it, and one of the houses used by the Coast Survey was built absolutely fire-proof for our use, and my recollection is, though I am not very sure about it, that the last time we had the matter before us we required General Butler to reduce, or he voluntarily reduced, the cost to be paid for the buildings.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the amendment specify the exact number of square feet to be purchased?

Mr. BECK. I can not say. I have never seen the amendment until just now when the chairman of the committee offered it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

Mr. CULLOM. I think there must be a mistake as to the quantity of land.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is 84 feet front and 150 feet deep.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the price is simply enormous.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois desire to have the amendment again read?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Vermont I think rather criticises my statement. I find on further examination of the paper before me that I was somewhat mistaken. General Butler says:

> I propose to sell to the United States, etc., my property on New Jersey avenue, B and South Capitol streets, in the city of Washington, containing 12,131 square feet of land, independent of the parking and streets, with the buildings thereon.

That would seem to indicate that it was 12,000 square feet. Now he goes on further:

> The number of square feet of floor space and the cubical contents of these buildings, respectively, are as follows:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | First building, square feet floor space | 9,377 |
> | Second building, square feet floor space | 9,377 |
> | Third building, square feet floor space | 16,117 |

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be the three stories.

Mr. ALLISON. So it would. The number of square feet floor space in all the buildings is 34,871.

> These buildings are all built of brick and stone, with vaulted outside walls, 22 inches thick, upon foundations extending down to the bank where the Potomac River originally flowed, so that in a period of fifteen years they have never perceptibly settled. They are all as thoroughly finished as they can be. The partition walls are all of brick, 18 inches thick between the several buildings, and the walls dividing the houses into rooms 12 inches thick from foundation to top. Every room, except those in the basement, is supplied with a fireplace, chimney, and ventilating shaft.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator if under the former provision of the act of Congress the appraisal was made of the value of this property?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At how much?

Mr. ALLISON. Two hundred and seventy-seven thousand six hundred and ninety-two dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who were the appraisers?

Mr. ALLISON. Thomas J. Fisher, Thomas B. Entwisle, and W. H. Clagett.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think they had better try it again before we buy the property.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit the matter to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have a simple amendment that I presume is subject to a point of order. I shall offer it, however, and ask to have some documents read, and then, if the chairman of the committee feels justified in withholding the point of order, I shall be obliged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the clause making appropriations for "lighting of rivers," on page 22, after the word "Oregon," in line 20, it is proposed to insert:

> On the Snake River, Washington Territory.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that the papers be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would feel compelled under the precedents established to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to have the papers read so as to have them appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They can be inserted without reading if the Senator desires, or will he have them read?

Mr. MITCHELL. It will be sufficient to insert them in the RECORD without reading them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be printed in the RECORD and the point of order will be sustained.

The papers are as follows:

> TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
> OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
> Washington, July 24, 1888.
> SIR: There is herewith inclosed a copy of a letter received at this office from the inspector of the thirteenth light-house district with reference to the establishment of lights in the Snake River, one of the tributaries of the Columbia. As the law stands at present, the board will be unable to comply with the recommendation, as the Snake River is not specifically mentioned. The insertion of it in line 20, page 22, of the sundry civil bill as now before the Senate would enable the board to establish the lights, which would no doubt be of value to those navigating both the Snake and the Columbia.
>
> Respectfully, yours,
>
> R. D. EVANS,
> Commander United States Navy, Naval Secretary.
>
> Hon. J. H. MITCHELL,
> United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

> OFFICE OF UNITED STATES LIGHT-HOUSE INSPECTOR, > THIRTEENTH DISTRICT,
> Portland, Oregon, July 16, 1888.
>
> SIR: I respectfully recommend the establishment of stake lights on the Snake River, Washington Territory.
>
> From Lewiston down for about 70 miles the boats run regularly. In the summer when the river is high and nights short the boating is not difficult. But in the fall of the year, when the wheat is being brought out, there is a great deal of business, and the river is low. There are several rapids, and range lights at four or five places would be of great assistance.
> The agent of the company operating most of the boats has requested me to establish the range lights. From ten to fifteen lights will be required. If authorized, I can establish and maintain all that are needed at a cost of about $1,500 per year or less.

> LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD, Washington, D. C.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is a separate vote desired on any of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. REAGAN. I desire a separate vote on the amendment to give $50,000 to the widow of Professor Baird.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is a separate vote desired on any other amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. PLUMB. Before the bill is passed I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa about the time which he thinks will elapse before this bill will finally become a law, taking into account the delays incident to a conference on a bill having had so many amendments made to it. I do this especially with reference to the time that the Senate is liable to be detained in session, which relates, of course, to the convenience and comfort of Senators, and no one, I think, is more liable to be posted upon that proposition than the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and a member of another very important committee of this body. There are probably some other appropriation bills that have not yet passed, about which also, I have no doubt, the Senate will be glad to be informed.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the amendments not reserved be acted on now and then, I shall be glad to answer the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is a separate vote desired on any amendment made in Committee of the Whole other than that reserved by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]? If not, the Chair will put the question on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment reserved, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 49, after line 19, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted the following:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Mrs. Mary H. C. Baird, widow of the late Spencer F. Baird, $50,000, in full compensation for the services and expenses of the said Spencer F. Baird during his administration of the office of Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, including rent of rooms for the use of said commission, from February 25,1871, to the time of his death, in August, 1887.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate concur in this amendment?

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). As I have already stated, I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], but I have an impression that he voted "yea" on this amendment when it was considered as in Committee of the Whole. I should vote "yea" myself if at liberty, and if any one can state positively that the Senator from North Carolina so voted heretofore, I will vote "yea" myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish his vote recorded?

Mr. DAWES. I will withhold my vote until I can ascertain that fact.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. Does his colleague know how he would probably vote on this question if he were present?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am exceedingly confident that my colleague thought it was one of the most just things Congress could possibly do.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I withhold my vote. If it were not for the pair I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], but on this question I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

So the roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BROWN (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. I have voted, but as I see the other Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] has voted "yea," I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia withdraws his vote.

Mr. DAWES. I learn that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] voted "yea" when this amendment was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. GIBSON. I announce my pair with the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST].

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired generally with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]; but I understand I am at liberty to vote on this question, and I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Allison,	Dawes,	Hiscock,	Sabin,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Blair,	Frye,	Mitchell,	Stewart,
Call,	Gray,	Payne,	Stockbridge,
Cullom,	Hampton,	Platt,	Teller,
Daniel,	Hawley,	Riddleberger,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—11.

Bate,	Chandler,	George,	Reagan,
Berry,	Cockrell,	Jones of Arkansas,	Walthall.
Blodgett,	Coke,	Pugh,

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Farwell,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Bowen,	Faulkner,	Morgan,	Stanford,
Brown,	Gibson,	Morrill,	Turpie,
Butler,	Gorman,	Paddock,	Vance,
Cameron,	Hale,	Palmer,	Vest,
Chace,	Harris,	Pasco,	Voorhees,
Colquitt,	Hearst,	Plumb,	Wilson of Md.
Davis,	Hoar,	Quay,
Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Eustis,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,

So the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments to the bill in the Senate?

Mr. EVARTS. I offer in the Senate the amendment for the purchase of the portraits of the signers of the treaty of 1783.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 117, after the amendment already agreed to, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

For the purchase of the unfinished painting, by Benjamin West, of the Peace Commissioners at the Treaty of Paris, $1,500.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]; but I see his colleague votes "nay," and I will also vote "nay."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will say that I have no knowledge, information, or belief——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order during the roll-call.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair is quite right. I was merely explaining a pair, which customarily has been allowed.

The roll-call was continued and concluded.

Mr. BROWN. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present, but I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I did not hear the complete statement of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], and I should be glad to hear it, as I followed him in voting, because I am paired with his colleague [Mr. MORRILL], and I wish to do whatever the Senator from Vermont thinks proper in the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair has announced that I was not at liberty to speak.

Mr. HARRIS. Not at that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The roll-call is yet in progress.

Mr. HARRIS. I will ask the Senator from Vermont if he has any information or idea how his colleague, if present, would vote upon this question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order, Mr. President, for me to reply?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not under the rules.

Mr. HARRIS. As I am unable to obtain any information, and recognize the fact that I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], I withdraw my vote. I have voted "nay," but I withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee withdraws his vote.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Allison,	Frye,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Gibson,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Call,	Gray,	Palmer,	Spooner,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Platt,	Stewart,
Cullom,	Hiscock,	Riddleberger,	Stockbridge,
Evarts,	Hoar,	Sabin,	Teller.

NAYS—18.

Bate,	Coke,	Jones of Arkansas,	Walthall,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Payne,	Wilson of Iowa,
Berry,	George,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.
Blackburn,	Hampton,	Reagan,
Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,

ABSENT—34.

Aldrich,	Davis,	Hearst,	Quay,
Blodgett,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Bowen,	Dolph,	Kenna,	Stanford,
Brown,	Eustis,	McPherson,	Turpie,
Butler,	Farwell,	Morgan,	Vance,
Cameron,	Faulkner,	Morrill,	Vest,
Chace,	Gorman,	Paddock,	Voorhees.
Colquitt,	Hale,	Pasco,
Daniel,	Harris,	Plumb,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no amendment to offer, but I wish to say a few words in regard to one amendment which has been adopted. I did not vote on the proposition simply because, while I was very much in favor of the allowance to Mrs. Baird of a reasonable sum, I thought the amount voted was too large, and therefore did not vote at all.

But I wish to state that the Senate has set a precedent in this matter. In the case of Professor Baird's predecessor, Professor Henry, a very eminent man and perhaps even more eminent in some respects than Professor Baird, he was allowed by the generosity of Congress $500 a year for the twenty-two years he served at the head of the Light-House Board, a scientific position, where he rendered great service to the Government. He died and the claim was made, and I had the honor of submitting it, and Congress generously allowed $10,000, expended for a house in which Professor Henry's wife and children now live. The amount of $50,000 for fifteen years' services of Professor Baird seems too large, but if it followed the precedent in Professor Henry's case, or even if twice the amount was given that was allowed to Mrs. Henry, I should have voted for the amendment with pleasure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, having now the right to speak on the question of the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill, I will say that the cases of Professor Henry and Mr. Baird were entirely different; but if you take the $500 a year extra allowance to Professor Henry for twenty-two years, that would make $11,000 of that. Then $11,000 more was given to Professor Henry; that made $22,000. He got $500 a year, it is stated, extra allowance during that period of time.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the only allowance ever made to Professor Henry, to my knowledge.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator is quite mistaken in that respect, but no matter about that.

The difference between these two cases is so wide and obvious that if the Senator knew the facts I am sure he would agree to the proposition before the Senate; and that was this, that the amount of labor and responsibility as distinguished between a member of the Light-House Board and the enormous labor that was imposed upon Professor Baird in this administrative work is too obvious to require any length of time to state it. I merely refer to it. But during the whole of these fifteen years, when the Fish Commission work of propagating, etc., was going on Professor Baird furnished, as Professor Henry did not, the rooms and appliances necessary to carry on that work out of his own private fortune and out of his own private rent; and if those rooms, thus necessarily occupied for the public interests, had been hired by the United States in the regular way from anybody else at an average of the rate that the United States is paying in this city of Washington all the time, it would take up a great deal more than half of this $50,000. Then, when you add to that the furniture, the attendance, the fuel, the lights, and everything which, besides the mere rent, goes into the account against the Treasury when we hire rooms and furnish them and take care of them, it would take one-half of the remainder that is left.

So that, for the mere service of Professor Baird for these fifteen years which destroyed his life, you give his widow really about $10,000 or $12,000; and as to the rest you are merely returning the money that he actually spent out of his own pocket to promote your service.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to be generous, and if we measure the work of both these officers at what it is really worth to science and the world, we could not pay for it in money. I agree to that. Both of these gentlemen were scientific men, who devoted their lives to their pursuits.

The idea, however, of paying $50,000 for fifteen years' work seems to be an exaggeration, and it would be more in accordance with the character of Professor Baird to make the sum moderate. He never made any claim for any of this during his lifetime. He rented a house probably worth $1,000 or $1,200 a year, a very respectable residence, and he occupied it and devoted a portion of it to scientific purposes, some of which was out of doors and some of which was indoors. At the same time I think a very reasonable sum would be to allow from $15,000 to $20,000, and it would be more in accordance with the well-known position of Professor Baird, who never, I believe, in his lifetime made a demand for this sum, nor did Professor Henry, and I think it was greatly to their credit.

I simply wished to explain why, though present in my seat, I did not vote upon that proposition. I trust that in the committee of conference the conferees on the part of the Senate may be able to estimate carefully the items that go to make up this sum.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, may I ask what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be ordered to a third reading?

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to avail myself of the opportunity which has been occasioned by the debate between the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to say that for the reason given by the Senator from Ohio for not voting at all I voted against the amendment giving to the heirs of Professor Baird $50,000.

I disagree entirely with the argument that the Congress of the United States can not vote money in a case of this kind unless the Government of the United States owes a debt which can be recovered in the Court of Claims. I agree entirely with the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] that there rests in this Government the power to recognize the services of those citizens who have been able in their lifetime to render distinguished service to the country or to illustrate the patriotism of an American citizen, and therefore it was with no misgivings on the question of the power of Congress to make this donation that I declined to vote for the $50,000.

I am willing to vote as a miscellaneous donation, but not as services or rent due but not collected, for the sum of $25,000. I am not willing to vote for the sum of $50,000; and as I am not willing to vote for that sum, I concluded that the natural and legitimate and appropriate method of expressing that dissent was to vote "nay" when the yeas and nays were called.

Mr. HAWLEY. Just a single remark. In estimating the sum to be given here I would not only take into consideration the actual expenditures of that distinguished professor, but I would measure that donation, if you choose to call it so, by his distinguished services in general. In estimating what his labors were worth we have some guide in the sum that is fixed in the annual compensation of his successor. Professor Baird was, in a measure, the originator and builder of this greatly improved system. Mr. McDonald takes it from Mr. Baird well established in the general confidence, and we give him $5,000 a year, and for fifteen and a half years that would be nearly $80,000. I am content to vote for the $50,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the amendments be engrossed, and the bill be ordered to a third reading?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the passage of the bill I desire to answer the inquiry made a few moments ago by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

I will say in response to his inquiry that there now remain undisposed of five of the regular appropriation bills, namely, the Navy bill, the Army bill, the bill which has just now passed the third reading, the general deficiency bill, and what is known as the fortifications bill. The Navy bill is now in conference and will likely be disposed of either in the last few days of this week or the early days of next. The Army bill is pending in the House of Representatives, as I believe, now being disposed of there upon amendments attached to it in the Senate. The general deficiency bill has not yet passed the House, nor has the fortifications bill. The general deficiency bill has been partially considered by the House, but the fortifications bill has only been reported within a day or two.

As to the time it will take for the consideration of this bill in the House of Representatives, of course it is impossible for me to say, but I think it may be said that there are fewer important amendments put upon it by the Senate than on any similar bill that has passed for many years. Therefore I think the sundry civil bill can be disposed of very readily either by the House consenting to the amendments which we have placed upon it or by conferences which can be had within a very brief space. So I think it may be safely assumed that next week we can dispose of all the appropriation bills. I think they can be disposed of next week, provided the House takes them up promptly and considers them so that the differences can be reconciled.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the chairman if he has a bill for to-morrow morning.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word further. Not only will the Committee on Appropriations have no more bills to-morrow morning, but they are not likely to have any for some days to come, because the only two remaining bills for action here are the deficiency bill and the fortifications bill, neither of which has yet passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to call up the Chinese bill to-morrow morning, if I can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I have stated the situation of the appropriation bills. I ought to say, perhaps, in connection with that statement that on last Saturday the Senate passed a bill extending last year's appropriations until the 31st day of August, so that so far as I know the business of the Appropriations Committee can be disposed of within the next ten days or two weeks.

The Senator from Kansas made an inquiry respecting another matter, on which I think probably I should perhaps say a word, and that is the tariff bill now pending in the Finance Committee. I presume he asks me that question because I have, in connection with some of my associates on that committee, been making some examination of that subject. Of course it is not possible for me to say when that tariff bill can be presented to the Senate. The chairman of the Committee on Finance can state more nearly, perhaps, than I can upon that subject; I will only say that so far as I am concerned, and so far as I have heard, it is the intention to bring that bill into this Chamber at the earliest practicable moment and have it considered here with all due speed consistent with its careful consideration.

Mr. GIBSON. Can the Senator from Iowa tell us whether the tariff bill will be here next week?

Mr. ALLISON. I can not.

Mr. GIBSON. Can the Senator from Ohio tell us whether the tariff bill is likely to be here next week or the week after?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know. No one can tell.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill was passed.

JACKSON, MISS., MUNICIPAL ELECTION.

Mr. PUGH. By leave of the Senate heretofore granted, I present the views of the minority of the Judiciary Committee in the matter of the investigation of the last municipal election in Jackson, Miss.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority report will be received and printed.

Mr. PUGH. Let it lie on the table with the majority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator have it printed?

Mr. PUGH. Yes; let it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution accompanying the report of the committee has been placed on the Calendar so that the views of the majority and minority may be printed together, if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 1106) providing for the revocation of the withdrawal of lands made for the benefit of certain railroads, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8285) to remove the political disabilities of Elliott Johnston.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 899) for the relief of Mary M. Briggs, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LANE, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4659) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the said bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. YODER, Mr. TILLMAN, and Mr. GEAR managers at the conference on the part of the House.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow instead of 12 o'clock.

Mr. HAWLEY. And, I suggest as an amendment, that it adjourn at 5 o'clock. There can be no objection to regular hours of work.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can not fix any time for adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better understand the matter. I think I shall call for a division, or the yeas and nays, because we ought to go on and finish the long debates that are likely to occur on the fisheries treaty; and there is another measure hanging here——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate can only proceed on the motion by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say that the hour of meeting is a matter of perfect indifference to me. I would as lief come here at 11 o'clock, or 12 o'clock, or any other hour, but I made the motion at the request of several Senators. There is the fisheries treaty which is under debate, and it is likely to provoke considerable discussion. There is also the Chinese bill, as it is called.

Mr. STEWART. And the Washington Territory bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. And the Washington Territory bill.

Mr. PLATT. And admission bills for other Territories.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are pressing matters which ought to be voted upon at the present session. The committee work is pretty well done at this session, except perhaps the Finance Committee and the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. Other committees have work.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will take the sense of the Senate and a majority will decide the question. I move that, until otherwise ordered, the Senate meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order. Stick to your original motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I move that the Senate meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio ask for the yeas and nays?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks that on agreeing to the motion that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock, the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. May I ask unanimous consent to say that if the Senator from Ohio will postpone his motion to-day he will accommodate some Senators very much, who have a very important committee meeting to-morrow, which must be dispensed with entirely if the session is to commence at 11 o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate will go on with the speech-making.

Mr. SHERMAN. The speech-making will go on.

Mr. DAWES. The only objection I have to the motion is that I happen to have to-morrow a very important committee meeting.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can go on with the committee meeting, and I presume it will not disturb any one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the roll-call will proceed on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]; otherwise I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. I do not know how he would vote, and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee withdraws his vote.

Mr. BECK (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. He allows me to vote when I please, but I think I ought to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws his vote.

Mr. PADDOCK (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], but I voted. I think I had better withdraw my vote.

Mr. HOAR. That will leave us without a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska withdraws his vote.

Mr. SABIN (after having voted in the affirmative). As the withdrawal of votes is in order, I will state that I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], and as I am doubtful whether my pair would allow me to vote on this question, I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota withdraws his vote.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—20.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Colorado to withdraw that motion for a moment, that I may ask the Chair to announce, from view, that there is a quorum present, in order that I may submit a conference report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no quorum.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no voting quorum, but——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The want of a quorum was disclosed on the vote last taken.

Mr. HARRIS. The want of a voting quorum was disclosed; that is true.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the roll-call may be dispensed with, and the Chair may ascertain by count whether a quorum is present.

Mr. TELLER. If my motion is in order, I ask that it be put.

Mr. BLAIR. How can it be in order under the rules?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Constitution gives us the right to adjourn from day to day.

Mr. COCKRELL. The motion is not in order.

Mr. HOAR. The motion is in order by the new rules, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule, in the opinion of the Chair, forbids the motion of the Senator from Colorado to be entertained by the Chair, a motion to adjourn only being in order now.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 2, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 1, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LONG. To ask unanimous consent to have a bill considered at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not recognize any gentleman for that purpose until certain matters are disposed of.

ELLIOTT JOHNSTON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8285) to remove the political disabilities of Elliott Johnston, with an amendment of the Senate thereto.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "legal and."

The amendment was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, the Senate having disagreed to the amendments of the House to the said bill and asked for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent that the House agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not require unanimous consent; it is a privileged matter; and if there be no objection, the conference will be agreed to and the Chair will appoint the conferees later.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MARY M. BRIGGS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair appoints as managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 899) for the relief of Mary M. Briggs, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. LANE, the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. FRENCH, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. THOMPSON.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 2449) granting a pension to James W. Bowman;
A bill (S. 2124) granting a pension to John Bush;
A bill (S. 1762) granting a pension to Benjamin A. Burtram;
A bill (S. 2448) granting a pension to Catharine McQuade;
A bill (S. 2520) granting a pension to James White;
A bill (S. 2653) granting a pension to Mary Curtin;

A bill (S. 2571) granting a pension to Edwin E. Chase;
A bill (S. 2366) granting a pension to Mrs. Emeline Anderson;
A bill (S. 2830) granting an increase of pension to Elvira M. Dorman;
A bill (S. 2779) granting a pension to Eliza M. Scandlin;
A bill (S. 2700) granting an increase of pension to Allen Glethen;
A bill (S. 2609) granting a pension to H. H. Russell;
A bill (S. 2578) granting a pension to Nathan B. Rarick;
A bill (S. 1076) granting a pension to the widow of John Leary, deceased;
A bill (S. 2656) granting a pension to the widow and minor children of Patrick Frawley;
A bill (S. 2655) granting a pension to Lydia Hawkins; and
A bill (S. 102) for the relief of Lucinda McGuire.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION, 1887–'88.

Mr. MAISH. I call for the regular order.

Mr. COBB. I desire to submit a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. MAISH. I withdraw the call, in order that the gentleman may introduce his resolution.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, introduced a concurrent resolution to provide for printing the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1887–'88; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MONUMENT TO VICTIMS OF PRISON-SHIPS.

Mr. SPINOLA. Is it in order for me to ask at this time that a report of the Committee on Military Affairs be printed in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask that the report of the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill (H. R. 1687) for the erection and completion of a monument to the memory of the victims of the prison-ships at Fort Greene, Brooklyn, N. Y., be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that this report was printed in the RECORD at the time when the bill was under consideration. If so, the second printing is unnecessary.

Mr. SPINOLA. If it has not been printed in the RECORD, I ask that it may be.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

The report (not heretofore published) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1687) for the erection and completion of a monument to the memory of the victims of the prison-ships at Fort Greene, Brooklyn, N. Y., do respectfully report:

After the battle of Brooklyn, Long Island, Augnst 17, 1776, when the American army under General Washington was defeated and compelled to retire to the northern part of Manhattan Island, the British prison-ships anchored in the Wallabout Bay were crowded with American naval prisoners who underwent experiences of a horrible nature, probably unequaled in the history of modern warfare.

Of these ships there were the Whitby, Prince of Wales, Good Hope, and the Old Jersey, or "Hell," as it was called by those who were confined in her—often more than a thousand at a time—in consequence of the sufferings they endured.

They all lay in the channel between what is now the Cob Dock and the inner shore of the bay, the Old Jersey being at the west side, nearly opposite what is now the west entrance to the New York navy-yard. The prisoners were crowded together in these dismantled ships or hulks, poorly fed, and badly treated, and they died by thousands. It is estimated that between 11,000 and 12,000 prisoners perished on these vessels, it being claimed that the mortality on the Old Jersey alone amounted to five a day.

The prison-ships were originally the transport vessels in which cattle and other supplies for the British army had been brought to America in 1776, and which had been anchored in Gravesend Bay and occupied by the prisoners taken in the battle of Brooklyn. Upon the occupation of the city by the British these soldiers were transferred to the prisons on shore and the transports were devoted more especially to the marine prisoners, whose numbers were rapidly increasing, owing to the frequent capture of American privateers by the king's cruisers.

The first prison-ship anchored in the Wallabout was the transport Whitby. She was moored near Remson's mill, which was on the west shore of the bay, near Martyn's Point, or Martyr's Hook, as it was subsequently called, about the 20th of October, 1776, and crowded with prisoners. Here the prisoners had bad provisions, worse water, and even these rations were small. No medical man attended the sick, disease had full sway, and pestilence reigned supreme. Hundreds died from pestilence or starvation, and the sand beach between the ravine in the hills—where Little street, Brooklyn, now is—and the shore became filled with graves in the course of two months.

In May, 1777, two large ships were anchored in the Wallabout, when the prisoners were transferred from the Whitby to them. These ships subsequently took fire, and some of the prisoners were burned in them before they could be removed to other vessels. In 1779 the Prince of Wales and the Good Hope were used as prison-ships. The latter was burned in 1780, and then the Stromboli, Scorpion, and Hunter, all nominally hospital-ships, took their place in the Wallabout. There were nearly a dozen others, but of all the Old Jersey won pre-eminence in the sad history of the prison-ships. She was originally a sixty-gun ship and had a long and honorable career, but, being unfit for further active service, in 1776 was converted into a prison-ship. She was dismantled, her port-holes were closed and securely fastened, and their places supplied by two tiers of small holes, each about 20 inches in diameter, with two iron bars crossed at right angles. Caged in the body of this hulk, with little light and almost no fresh air, packed together like animals, poorly fed on what was sometimes spoiled and wormy food, and given water that was stagnant, the prisoners died off like flies. It was no wonder that they gave their horrible hole of suffering, pestilence, and death the nickname of "Old Hell."

The horrors of these ships are a matter of history. The foul air, confinement, darkness, hunger, thirst, the slow poison of the malarious locality, the torments of vermin, the suffocating heat in summer, the excessive cold in winter, the horrible brutality of the officers and the guards, who would frequently fire among or bayonet the prisoners for some trivial or pretended offense, the almost total absence of hope, are things too sickening to dwell upon.

At the expiration of the war the Old Jersey was abandoned where she lay. The dread of contagion prevented any one venturing on board, but it was not long until the worms, which had been at work upon her timbers, made way for the water to rush in, and she went down into the waters of the Wallabout, carrying with her the only record of the names of thousands of sufferers which had been inscribed upon her inner planks.

The dead from these ships had been taken on shore and buried in trenches dug in the sand, and for years after the war their bones were found all around the bend of the bay, but more especially on the west side. We are informed by parties connected with the navy-yard that even now in making excavations they find the bones of human beings, supposed to have been victims of the prison-ships.

For several years after the war was over the bones of those who suffered martyrdom in these ships for the cause of liberty were to be seen, scarce covered, on the banks of the Wallabout, or strewn upon its shores, and bleaching in the winter's storm and summer's sun. Several patriotic individuals endeavored to have the attention of Congress directed to the subject, but no formal movement was made to give the bones proper interment until 1792, when the citizens of Brooklyn, at a regular town meeting, resolved that the bones which had been disinterred and collected by John Jackson should be removed and buried in the graveyard of the Reformed Church and a monument erected over them.

John Jackson was a native of Queens County, Long Island, who removed to Brooklyn soon after the Revolution. About 1791 he purchased what was known as the Remsen estate, situated on the Wallabout, which comprised about 30 acres of land, 35 of pond, together with the old Remsen mill and dwelling. This farm was partly on what was known as Martyr's or Martyn's Hook, where Little street runs down to the water, and extended as far west as Gold street, and east into the navy-yard. It was in making improvements on the farm that Mr. Jackson found large quantities of the bones in cutting away the high banks which then formed the shore of the bay. In 1801 he sold 40 acres of this farm to the United States for a navy-yard, it being the west portion of the yard, north of the present York street entrance. When the committee of the town meeting above mentioned applied, in 1793, for the privilege of removing the bones, Mr. Jackson refused, as he had other plans in view. He was an influential member and a sachem of the Tammany Society, or Columbian Order. He offered this society an eligible piece of ground on his property in the Wallabout at a point which is now at the east end of Front street, by the navy-yard wall, for the purpose of erecting a suitable sepulcher, which the society accepted.

In 1803 a memorial to Congress was prepared and sent to Washington, but nothing was done by this body. In the mean time, Benjamin Aycrigg, shocked at the exposed condition of the remains, made a contract in 1805 with an Irishman living in the Wallabout "to collect the bones as far as may be without digging," and deliver them to him at a stipulated price, which was done, and the remains thus collected formed a portion of those afterward placed in the Tomb of the Martyrs. In 1808 the Tammany Society appointed a committee and proceeded to take steps toward the long-talked of sepulcher. They initiated an extensive correspondence, published stirring appeals, and invited patriotic citizens all over the country to make a national affair of it. The public took hold zealously, and showed so much interest that the corner-stone of the tomb was laid on the 13th of April, 1808. An imposing military and civic procession formed at Fulton Ferry, under Major Aycrigg, grand marshal, and marched through Main, Sands, Bridge, and Jackson (now Hudson) streets, Brooklyn, to the vault on Jackson street adjoining the navy-yard. Benjamin Romaine, grand sachem of Tammany, assisted by the Wallabout committee, laid the corner-stone of the vault, upon which was the inscription:

"In the name of the spirits of the departed free, sacred to the memory of American seamen, soldiers, and citizens who perished on board the prison-ships of the British at Wallabout during the Revolution.

"This is the corner-stone of the vault erected by the Tammany Society, or Columbian Order, which contains their remains, the ground for which was bestowed by John Jackson, Nassau Island. Season of blossoms. Year of the discovery the 316th, of the institution the 19th, and of American Independence the 32d.

"April 6, 1808."

Ceremonies were completed by the interment of thirteen mammoth coffins, and orations by the most distinguished men of the day.

Subsequent to the interment the excitement was kept up for awhile. Some money was collected, and then the martyrs' tomb dropped out of public notice. Stiles, in his "Wallabout Prison-Ship Series," speaking of the Tammany demonstration, gives this peroration:

"The pious tribute of the living to the dead is always solemn and affecting; a society in mourning for a hero is interesting to every one who beholds it, but a nation of freemen bending in tears over the tomb of eleven thousand martyrs to the cause of liberty is a sight never before exhibited and presents a sublime theme for the historian and the poet. Happy, happy Columbia! May returning years still find thee as thou art this day—grateful to thy heroes, the nurse of liberty, at peace with the world."

After the great procession the tomb, unfinished, was left to take care of itself.

When the grade of Jackson street was altered the walls of the vault were infringed upon, and finally the very lot with the tomb upon it, containing the moldering dust of these eleven thousand heroes, was sold for taxes.

Benjamin Romaine, a true patriot, who had been a soldier in the war, came forward and bought the lot rescuing the remains from desecration. He erected an ante-chamber over the vault and appropriately adorned it. This was in 1839. Mr. Romaine held the place sacred, and in order to protect it from desecration he appropriated the tomb as a burial place for himself and family. At his death, in 1844, his body was placed in a coffin which he had long kept for himself in the vault. Two years before his death a committee of citizens petitioned the Legislature for leave to remove the bones for the purpose of appropriate sepulture, but Mr. Romaine protested. He said:

"I have guarded these sacred remains, with a reverence which perhaps at this day all may not appreciate or feel, for more than thirty years. They are now in their right place, near the Wallabout and adjoining the navy-yard. They are my property. I have expended more than $900 in and about their protection and preservation. I commend them to the protection of the General Government. I bequeath them to my country. This concern is very sacred to me. It lies near my heart. I suffered with those whose bones I venerate. I fought beside them; I bled with them."

In consequence of this remonstranee nothing was done.

Ten years later a large meeting of citizens of Brooklyn resolved—"That the time has arrived when the cities of New York and Brooklyn can not, without criminality, longer delay the necessary efforts for rearing the monument to the martyrs of the prison-ships;" and an organization was formed, entitled the "Martyrs' Monumental Association," in which each senatorial district in the State of New York and each State and Territory in the Union was represented. They set to work, selected a site on Fort Greene, secured plans for the monument, agitated the subject, and solicited donations. But once more enthusiasm died, and two more decades had almost passed before anything was done.

The common council of the city of Brooklyn having granted the association an appropriate lot on Fort Greene, called Washington Park, the site was utilized in 1873. In that year a brick vault, 25 by 11 feet, was completed in the side of the hill facing toward the junction of Myrtle avenue and Canton street, it being the nearest point toward the Wallabout. By this time the vault on Hudson avenue (formerly Jackson street) had become so dilapidated from neglect that the remains were in an exposed state, many of the old coffins being broken or defaced. Twenty-two new boxes were procured, the old coffins placed in them, and on the 17th day of June, 1873, all that remained of the mortal part of the 11,000 martyrs of the prison-ships was quietly removed to the vault at Washington Park. There was no ostentation this time; it was simply a labor of love.

After nearly a century of neglect, relieved occasionally by spasmodic bursts of patriotism, the bones were at last placed in a spot where it is believed they will rest undisturbed until time shall be no more. So quietly was the removal performed, and so little interest does it seem to have elicited, that the daily papers of the day did not make any mention of it. The vault was covered with asphalt and the surface restored, and there are few people in the city to-day who know where these bones lie buried. The base-work of the intended ornamental stone superstructure has been constructed, upon which it is intended to erect the monument proposed by the accompanying bill.

This chosen site of Fort Greene is a lofty eminence looking down upon the Wallabout, where the prison-ships were anchored; it also commands a view of the whole city of Brooklyn and the surrounding country upon which in 1776 the battle of Long Island was fought. During the battle this battery was known as Fort Putnam, in honor of General Putnam, who was the immediate commander of the American Army during the illness of General Greene. From this eminence General George Washington, Commander-in-Chief, became the agonizing witness of the rout and slaughter of Sullivan's command, and during the whole engagement directed the movements of the American Army. It was here that he signed the order to retreat, when he saw that resistance in the face of overwhelming forces was useless. On this spot he encouraged the suffering soldiers with words of hope during the last day of the battle until the night brought the fog that made retreat possible.

Immediately after this memorable retreat the British, having gained absolute possession, used Brooklyn for the incarceration of the prisoners of war.

News of the barbarous and inhuman treatment of these prisoners reached Congress in 1781, when a special committee was appointed consisting of Mr. Boudinot, Mr. Sharpe, and Mr. Clymer, who submitted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That it appears to Congress that a very large number of marine prisoners and citizens of the United States, taken by the enemy, are now close confined on board prison-ships in the harbor of New York.

"That the said prison-ships are so unequal in size to the number of prisoners as not to admit of a possibility of preserving life in this warm season of the year, they being crowded together in such a manner as to be in danger of suffocation, as well as exposed to every kind of putrid and pestilential disorder.

"That no circumstances of the enemy's particular situation can justify this outrage on humanity, it being contrary to the usage and custom of civilized nations thus deliberately to murder their captives in cold blood, as the enemy will not assert that prison-ships equal to the number of prisoners can not be obtained so as to afford room sufficient for the necessary purposes of life.

"That the enemy do daily improve the distresses to enlist and compel many of our citizens to enter on board their ships of war, and thus to fight against their fellow-citizens and dearest connections.

"That the said marine prisoners, until they can be exchanged, should be supplied with such necessaries of clothing and provisions as can be obtained to mitigate their present sufferings.

"That therefore the Commander-in-Chief be, and is hereby, instructed to remonstrate to the proper officer within the enemy's lines on the said unjustifiable treatment of our marine prisoners, and demand in the most express terms to know the reasons of this unnecessary severity towards them; and that the Commander-in-Chief transmit such answer as may be received thereon to Congress, that decided measures for due retaliation may be adopted, if a redress of these evils is not immediately given.

"That the Commander-in-Chief be, and is hereby, instructed to direct the supplying of the said prisoners with such provisions and light clothing for their present more comfortable subsistence as may be in his power to obtain, and in such manner as he may deem most advantageous for these United States."

There is no question that these men were martyrs to the cause of liberty; that those who survived the war and were honored by the grateful care of their Government and esteemed until the close of their lives for their patriotism and valor were entitled to much less than these unfortunate victims of cruelty and hardship, and that the least that the Government can do at this time is to erect to them a monument upon which shall be inscribed a record of their service and the story of their martyrdom.

The propriety of the erection of such a monument by the nation will not be questioned in view of these facts.

These helpless victims were prisoners of war, belonging not to any city or State, but to the whole country; captured by the enemy while in the service of their country in both the Army and Navy; citizens of all the original thirteen States, and numbered more than were slain in all the battles, both by land and sea, of that long and desperate struggle for freedom.

Had these victims been less arduous in their patriotism or less firm in their devotion to liberty; had they purchased their lives by enlisting in the service of the enemy, as they were daily importuned to do, and this army of 12,000 valiant men been added to the forces against which Washington and his compatriots were fighting the struggle of our forefathers would have no doubt been greatly prolonged.

There has been laid before the committee the following concurrent resolutions relative to erection of a monument to the "martyrs of the prison-ships" at the Wallabout during the Revolutionary war, passed by the senate and assembly of the State of New York, February 28, 1888:

"Whereas the "Society of Old Brooklynites," of the city of Brooklyn, has presented a petition to the Congress of the United States for the erection of a monument to commemorate the virtues and patriotism of more than 12,000 soldiers and sailors who perished on board the prison-ships at the Wallabout during the Revolutionary war; and

"Whereas those unhappy victims were citizens of the United States, prisoners of war, captured while in the service of this country during its long and desperate struggle for freedom, when the Government was too feeble to afford them protection or relieve their sufferings: Therefore,

"Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State be and they hereby are earnestly requested to use all honorable means in their power to secure the passage of the bill (H. R. 1687) having for its object the erection of a monument to the memory of the 'martyrs of the prison-ships.'

"Resolved (if the assembly concur), That a duly certified copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions be forwarded to each Senator and Representative in Congress from this State."

Also the following resolution from the Kings County board of supervisors, passed January 19, 1888:

"Whereas the 'Society of Old Brooklynites,' of the city of Brooklyn, have petitioned the Congress of the United States for an appropriation to fitly commemorate by a monument the 'martyrs of the prison-ships' of the Revolutionary war; and

"Whereas the board heartily approves of the motives and patriotic zeal displayed by the said society in the noble effort to inspire devotion to country, perpetuating the virtues of those who sacrificed their lives for republican principles, thus stimulating future generations to emulate their patriotism: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the board of supervisors of Kings County does hereby approve of and indorse the honorable and praiseworthy efforts of the 'Society of Old Brooklynites' to obtain a fitting monument to be placed over the remains of those who perished at the birth of this Republic.

"Resolved, That we most cordially extend to the 'Society of Old Brooklynites' our earnest support and encouragement, and express the hope that their efforts will be rewarded by the people through their Representatives in Congress."

Similar resolutions were also adopted by the board of aldermen.

Also the following petition from the "Society of Old Brooklynites," who have been mainly instrumental in preserving these relics and in bringing these historical facts before this committee:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"Your petitioners, an incorporated society of the city of Brooklyn, under the title of 'The Society of Old Brooklynites,' would respectfully represent:

"That the remains of more than eleven thousand five hundred martyrs to the cause of liberty lie entombed in this city, who died during our Revolutionary war on board the prison-ships of the British at the Wallabout, and which were buried on our shores during that memorable struggle, many of which were by the action of the waves washed out of their shallow graves, their bones scattered along the beach, exposed to the summer's sun and winter's storms until the year 1808, when the Tammany Society, or Columbian Order, of the city of New York, had them collected and buried with imposing ceremonies, in which the governors of several States, mayors of cities, and civil, military, and ecclesiastical dignitaries from all parts of the country took part.

"The place of burial was on Jackson street in this city, and the tomb—a temporary wooden structure, in which they were placed—became so dilapidated, by reason of changes made in the surroundings and from natural decay, that the sacred remains were again exposed to the gaze of the multitude, until the park commissioners of this city, with the sanction of the city government, prepared with great care and expense a permanent and imperishable tomb for their reception on the historic ground of Fort Greene—a charming elevation in Washington Park in this city, overlooking the scene of their sufferings and death—to which the sacred remains were cheerfully removed and deposited.

"These devoted patriots, from every one of the original thirteen States, were prisoners of war, taken by the British army and navy, and numbered more than were killed in all the battles, both by sea and land, in that long and desperate struggle for freedom.

"When it is remembered that constant and unremitting efforts were made by the British officers to induce these prisoners to purchase their freedom and save their lives by enlisting in the service of the enemy; that many, probably the majority, of them had families who were suffering by reason of their absence; that to remain in these horrible prisons was almost certain death; and that under all these circumstances they remained faithful to the cause in which they had enlisted, and preferred death to dishonor, we must concede that they earned the title of martyrs of the prison-ships, and deserve such recognition from the Government, to aid in the establishment of which they sacrificed their lives, as will show to the world that republics are not ungrateful, but that we cherish their memories, honor their devotion to their country, and will erect such an enduring monument to commemorate their virtues as will stimulate future generations to emulate their patriotism.

"We therefore most respectfully ask that your honorable body will make an appropriation of not less than $100,000 toward the erection of a suitable monument to be erected at or near the spot where their sacred remains now lie, the site for which will be donated for that purpose by the city of Brooklyn.

"This society will most cheerfully give all the aid in their power toward the accomplishment of the object of this petition."

Also the following petition, signed by 25,000 citizens of the United States:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"Your petitioners, citizens of the United States, do respectfully and earnestly pray your honorable body to hear and grant the petition of the Society of Old Brooklynites and to cause the erection of the long-delayed monument to the martyrs of the prison-ships."

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass with the following amendment:

"Provided, That the money appropriated as aforesaid shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the plans, specifications, and design shall first be approved by him."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the call of committees for reports be dispensed with and that members be allowed to file reports with the Clerk.

Mr. GEAR. I want to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] object?

Mr. GEAR. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore proceeded to call the committees for reports.

SOLOMON LUSK.

Mr. CROUSE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2490) for the relief of Solomon Lusk; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS NEWMAN.

Mr. STOCKDALE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5375) for the relief of Thomas Newman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GEORGE M. OCHILTREE.

Mr. GEAR. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back, with the amendment of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 4659) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree. I am directed by the committee to ask that the Senate amendment be non-concurred in, and that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. YODER, Mr. TILLMAN, and Mr. GEAR as conferees on the part of the House upon the bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FISHER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. DORSEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, indefinitely, commencing on the 3d instant.

To Mr. LEHLBACH, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, an extension of his leave of absence for ten days from Thursday next, on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is now in order to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. I desire, however, to ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill be now considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, in order to avoid the trouble of going into Committee of the Whole and back again into the House. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill with the Senate amendments, and that those amendments be now considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. It will then be in order for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] to offer his amendment in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill, and that the Senate amendments thereto be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object. I think this is so important a matter that the regular proceeding should be adhered to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to non-concur in the remaining amendments of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not state at this moment, as the clerk who keeps account of the time is absent just now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. While that matter is being looked up I ask that the Committee of the Whole agree now to some limitation of time upon this debate. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] to indicate some length of time which will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. SAYERS. Not yet. Several gentlemen desire to be heard. I may not care to occupy but little additional time myself, but I prefer not to make any arrangement as to the time just now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope my friend from Texas will recognize the importance of limiting the discussion.

Mr. SAYERS. We will limit it after a little while. The Army is provided for already for thirty days.

Mr. BLOUNT. Even if it was not, that is no reason for not giving this matter full consideration.

Mr. HOOKER rose.

Mr. BURNES. I would like to inquire what is now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to non-concur in the amendment No. 26 to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BURNES. We have reached the military bill by passing over the deficiency bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumed the consideration of the unfinished business, which was the Army appropriation bill.

In response to the gentleman from Illinois, the Chair is informed by the Clerk that thirty minutes of the gentleman's time yet remain.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will not claim that time now. I understand the gentleman from Missouri desires to address the House.

Mr. HOOKER. I had intended to ask to be recognized now, but if the gentleman from Missouri desires to proceed I will yield with a great deal of pleasure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I have not been in the habit of thrusting myself into a debate unless it seemed to me absolutely and indispensably necessary. I can only say now, in making a seeming departure from my regular course, that the illness and absence of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL], who is a member of the subcommittee on fortifications, afford me an incentive and perhaps a justification.

I shall premise the remarks I will submit on this occasion by calling attention to the fact that the subcommittee in charge of the fortifications bill now on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole was composed of my colleagues from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], the honored chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. RANDALL], from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], and from Kansas [Mr. RYAN].

The views I shall present are my own, but it is believed that they are in accord with those of the distinguished gentleman whose absence has caused me to speak.

I listened on yesterday with much interest and attention to the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], and it is almost idle to say, what nearly every member upon this floor concedes, that when he states his propositions to the House he follows them to their logical conclusions with an accuracy that is excelled by but few. He stated his propositions yesterday in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], and upon the proposition so stated by him his argument was logical, close fitting, and unanswerable. But upon the propositions as laid down by my friend from Georgia, the argument of the distinguished gentleman does not, in any sense, apply. What was the proposition, or what were the several propositions of the distinguished gentleman from Maine?

He stated first that the Senate of the United States was a co-ordinate—a co equal—branch of the legislative power of the Government with the House. Who disputes it? Certainly not my honored friend from Georgia. He laid down as a proposition that we had no right to dictate to the Senate of the United States upon what bill it should place its legislation. Who disputes it? Conceding every proposition that he made, and then what is left for us but the very ground upon which the distinguished gentleman from Georgia leaves it, namely, that while we concede equality to the Senate and its right to put upon any House bill it pleases such legislation as it may have the power to originate under the Constitution of the United States, we claim for this House a perfect equality of right. This House has the same rights on its part that the Senate has in its own behalf, and, inasmuch as the Senate is the co-equal of the House, except in so far as it can not originate appropriation bills, so the House is the equal of the Senate in all respects with the exclusive right to originate revenue or appropriation bills.

This is no partisan question. We represent the majority of the House to-day. But how soon may that side of this Chamber represent the power, the dignity, and the honor of the House and be charged with the duty of enforcing and preserving its rules.

Mr. GEAR. Very soon. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNES. It may be soon, which God forbid. It may be late, as I believe it will be.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It never will be.

Mr. BURNES. Brother TOWNSHEND says it never will be.

Mr. RYAN. That settles it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNES. As he is our prophet I accept it, too, as it is supported by the unanimous voice on my side of the House. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I desire to appeal to your love and respect for the body of which we are all members, to your own self-respect, to the honest pride of American Congressmen, and to their sense of duty in maintaining the rights and prerogatives of the House against Senatorial usurpations. I desire to lift you from your knees before that grand Sanhedrim—some times called a social club—at the other end of this Capitol and place you upon your feet as free and independent men, knowing your rights and the rights of the House, and having the courage to maintain and protect them.

What is your right? You have made rules and regulations for the government not of the Senate but for the government of the House. It is not the Senate's business, we will say, to observe or enforce your rules, but it is manifestly the business of the House to enforce its own rules and maintain its own dignity. Throughout the Forty-ninth Congress, when my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] was a member, and a leading member, upon the Committee on Appropriations, this question of making appropriations for fortifications was agitated between the two Houses. Bills came and bills went, and they went and came, every time to and from the Committee on Appropriations and the Subcommittee on Fortifications. The same differences existed then that exist to-day. The same disposition of the Senate to carry through its measure by any practicable means that existed then is apparent now. The conflict between the Senate and the House in the Forty-ninth Congress had some curious features, to which allusion should be made, and the members on both sides of the Chamber ought to take notice of them. The Senate was urging upon this branch of Congress the very measures which now appear as amendments on the bill of the Committee on Military Affairs. They were the issues then as they are the issues now. Your Committee on Appropriations with a veteran spirit of legislation steadily resisted the propositions which the Military Committee has been quick to approve; and it seems fair to assume that because of this eager approval by the committee the Senate Committee on Appropriations has leaped over the established and known comity between the two Committees on Appropriations, the customs of legislation between them, and the well-known rules of the House of Representatives, known as fully by the Senate committee as by the House committee, and all to transfer jurisdiction over a vast field of proposed national expenditure to a committee of the House committed in advance to the policies of the Senate committee.

But I am delaying an explanation of my remark that there were some curious features about this proposed legislation. During the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress there was reported to the Senate of the United States a bill entitled "A bill to encourage the manufacture of steel for modern Army ordnance, armor, and other Army purposes, and to provide heavy ordnance adapted to heavy modern warfare and other purposes." This bill provided for the establishment of a gun foundry at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., and authorized the purchase of 10,000 gross tons of gun steel. Pending the consideration of this bill in the Senate, the House, during the same session of the Forty-ninth Congress, passed the regular appropriation bill providing for fortifications and other works of defense. The Senate passed that bill with amendments appropriating $6,000,000 for the purchase of gun steel, and provided for the erection of the gun foundry at the Frankford arsenal, Philadelphia.

I will only allude to the motives influencing gentlemen elsewhere, by calling attention here and now to this significant change in legislation proposed by the Senate, and to leave it to the consideration of thoughtful members to determine the reason for such sudden change in the minds of those behind this proposition. Then Watervliet was a mere incident; Philadelphia was the right place. But your committee yielded not. The question was higher and more sacred than that of a mere location. It was above all personal considerations, or ought to have been, and was with the House subcommittee. Now, it is Watervliet again, as the change to Frankford did not increase the activities of support of the Senate amendments.

There is yet another question in this connection that I would call to the attention of the House. The Senate amendments under consideration embrace in substance and effect the features of one of the regular, distinctive appropriation bills, which, under the rules of the House, is assigned to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations.

If this House should, by its action, concur in this amendment, placed in violation of its rules and of the joint parliamentary practices of the Senate and House upon an appropriation bill emanating from a committee having no jurisdiction, it will give warrant to the Senate, in the future, to usurp the rights and even the constitutional privileges of the House, among which is the sole right in the House of originating appropriation bills. For the fortification appropriation bill, which the House directs by its rules to be made by the Committee on Appropriations, has been made in the Senate and has been tacked on to the bill of a committee which did not originate it, and had not the power to originate it.

There is now pending in the Senate a bill (S. 62) for the purpose of providing fortifications and other defenses recommended by a board appointed by the President of the United States. This bill proposes an appropriation of $126,377,800. If the action of the Senate now under consideration is not met with stern opposition on the part of the House, may we not expect at the next session that the Army appropriation bill will be returned to this body with an amendment of the Senate embracing this bill, appropriating out of the moneys in the Treasury, either now or hereafter to be collected, this startling sum of $126,377,800?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BURNES. I am very weary in this heated caldron, and would rather not be interrupted.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Do I understand you to say that the fortification bill of the last Congress located the works at Frankford arsenal, Philadelphia? If I do so understand you, I have a bill before me which you will find at——

Mr. BURNES. I did not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It says to be located——

Mr. BURNES. Give me your question again.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It says to be located at such place as the Board of Ordnance shall determine.

Mr. BURNES. I say that in the original bill that was reported in the Senate it was proposed to establish the gun foundry at Watervliet, but the amendment placed upon the fortification appropriation bill embraced, in all respects, the substance of that bill, except that it was proposed to establish the gun foundry at the Frankford arsenal, in Philadelphia, instead of at the Watervliet arsenal.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The House bill in the Forty-ninth Congress does not locate it at Frankford but leaves it to be determined by a board of ordnance at such place as they shall determine. In the last hours of the last Congress——

Mr. BURNES. I am not talking about what was reported from a conference committee in the dying hours of the session, either by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or any one else; I am speaking of the action of the Senate in amending the House bill by the insertion of the Frankford arsenal as the place of location, and in daring impudently and wrongfully to invade privileges of the American House of Representatives and requiring that we should sacrifice our rules at its behest and renounce the constitutional right of the House to originate bills of appropriation. The motive is a proper subject of inquiry.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. You are speaking about what occurred in the last Congress, not in the present, of course.

Mr. BURNES. I think there is no misunderstanding about what I have said in regard to this proposition.

Mr. Chairman, the representatives of the United States assembled in this House owe a duty to themselves as well as to the people of this great country and their public Treasury. Will you not look into the quality and motives of legislation that comes to us from another body? That is the question, and it is intimately connected with the preservation of the rights, the usefulness, the dignity, and the honor of the American House of Representatives, and the orderly, economical, and constitutional appropriation of the public revenues for the proper administration of the General Government.

Perhaps I ought not to go further, yet I can not forbear. In deference to my estimate of one of the purest men who ever sat in the American Congress I make a further observation. When this changed proposition—Frankford nor Watervliet—came to the head of the Committee on Appropriations he saw in it only the mistaken estimate that local considerations might prevail over the interests and rights of the people, over wholesome and necessary legislation, and over just and proper expenditures. Whatever, therefore, may have been the motive of this Senate amendment made to the House bill in the Forty-ninth Congress, its author turned to Watervliet and turned his back on unappreciative Frankford. Like a weary dove, long on the wing, he finally lit, a wiser, perhaps a better man. His fight is now located. Watervliet is the incident, the sale of $5,000,000 worth of steel by some oversupplied baron the object.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BURNES. I can not resist the gentleman from Michigan, and yield.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that it was Mr. RANDALL'S desire that these works should be located at the Frankford arsenal?

Mr. BURNES. Of course you did not.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. BURNES. Nobody else did, I hope.

Mr. CUTCHEON. In the colloquy which occurred on this subject in the last Congress Mr. RANDALL said:

I wish to say, in reply to the insinuation of the gentleman from New York, and I appeal to my colleagues on the committee to substantiate my statement, that I never favored Frankford at all.

Mr. BURNES. Precisely; and I have been endeavoring to show that even under the tempting bait of $126,000,000 proposed to be ultimately expended at Frankford the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations never wavered for an instant. Favors to his own State or people could not make him see as right that which his judgment taught him was wrong. I ask the Clerk to read the Senate amendment to the fortification bill of the last Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, manufacture, and erection of the necessary tools and machinery for the finishing and assembling of heavy ordnance at the Frankford arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa., for guns in process of construction, gun-carriages, projectiles, fuses, powder implements, and materials for the trial and proof of such ordnance, and to complete the two 10-inch breech-loading steel guns now under fabrication, their trial and proof, and all necessary expenses incident thereto, including the compensation of draughtsmen on gun construction while employed in the Ordnance Bureau, $400,000; to be available until expended.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I ought not to leave this subject without saying that while I have done honor to the gentleman who is, perhaps, entitled to the chief honor in this matter, I should not omit rendering a just tribute to the other members of the Committee on Appropriations of both parties, who watched this proposed legislation closely throughout the whole of the Forty-ninth Congress, and who stood, I believe unanimously, against the Senate proposition and in favor of that of the House; and while I am not authorized to speak for them now, and they are abundantly able to speak for themselves, I trust in God they will speak out, whether upon the one side or the other. I trust they will speak out and give the House to understand that they too have felt, as we all have felt, that this proposition of the Senate was a labored effort to accomplish an appropriation of more money than ought to be now appropriated for the purchase of steel rather than by a desire for the utilization of Watervliet, the utilization of Frankford, or the protection of the interests of the Government and the people of the United States.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I want to ask the gentleman one more question. Is it not a fact that all three of the measures now under consideration, the Senate amendments, the fortification bill reported by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and the Senate bill, all name Watervliet as the location? Is not that true?

Mr. BURNES. I have not examined with reference to that subject.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have.

Mr. BURNES. I presume the gentleman has done so and that he states the truth about it. I am not speaking of the propositions now pending further than to say that they do not commend themselves to the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, nor, as I believe, to the representatives of either party upon that committee. Mere questions as to location should have no influence. The necessities, the practicable wants of the country as a whole should be the supreme consideration.

Mr. CUTCHEON. One more question. Is it not a fact that since the bill of the Forty-ninth Congress was before us a board has been appointed by the Secretary of War known as the Flagler board, of which Colonel Mordecai was a member, and that that board recommended Watervliet?

Mr. BURNES. I beg that the gentleman will not interrupt me further. He has his own time. I care nothing for Watervliet, have no feeling against it.

Mr. Chairman, I come to a consideration which I regard as of great importance, not only to this House, but to the people of the whole country.

In strict justice, perhaps, to myself, I ought to say that I have no fear of the invasion of this country by any foreign foe. I have no apprehension; I see no necessity for the expenditure of $120,000,000 to $150,000,000 at this time for national defense, and therefore I am not in favor either of the one bill or of the other. I presume the majority of the Committee on Appropriations are in favor of some legislation in this direction, with which, however, I have never been able to agree. I do not believe in this legislation. I believe that it is partial legislation. I believe that it is the expenditure of millions of the people's money on account of an imaginary or pretended risk that a very few of the 60,000,000 of our people may incur. I can see why my distinguished and energetic friend from the district of Troy may be alarmed, because he has Watervliet there to represent. I can understand that. I am sure that he feels an apprehension that an armed fleet from Great Britain or Germany or France will sail up the Hudson River into the heart of his district and lay his prosperous towns and cities under tribute. But I do not share the apprehension at all.

Yet, as was suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], there may be one chance in a thousand that we may have difficulty with some foreign nation or may have a foreign war. Now, to meet that possible chance are we to undertake the expenditure of a sum of money so vast as that proposed when the same amount would give us a navy that could command the oceans around the globe; or what is more important still, could protect every mile of our seacoasts against the combined navies of the world. Already we are moving unitedly in this direction, and the present able administration of the Navy Department is alive to the safety, the defense, and the glory of our country and its flag. Shall we learn from a consideration of the fact that neither England, nor Germany, nor France, nor Russia, nor any other first-class power places any reliance upon an established manufactory of this sort? No one of those governments maintains such an establishment as is proposed in this bill. Why? Because Germany and the other European states prefer to leave this work to their Krupps and their other able and distinguised private citizens who, under proper support from the government, are making the very best guns in the world.

But we do not stop there. If any government of Europe, from which some of my friends may apprehend an attack, should attack us, what do we want more than terms of equality in the conflict? Those powers have no government big gun manufactory on which they mainly rely. Why shall we fear assault any more than they? Besides, we are in a condition of protection and defense fully equal to any of them. What have we to fear?

Mr. CUTCHEON. They have the big guns however.

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir; and we are going to have the "big guns." We have the "big guns" now being made, and we have furthermore the very best establishment for that purpose in the world. I ask the Clerk to read the paragraphs marked on pages 4 and 5 of the report of the present distinguished Secretary of the Navy, one of the ablest that has ever been at the head of that Department, and who enjoys the perfect confidence and esteem of the members of this House on both sides of that aisle.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Navy Department had, in the summer of 1886, as an experiment, consolidated in one advertisement all of its requirements for armor and gun-steel for ships of war then authorized, stipulating that it should be of domestic manufacture and giving an average of two and a half years in which to produce and deliver it, which covered the time necessary for the procurement of a plant. A period of about seven months was allowed for the submission of bids, in order to afford an opportunity for full investigation by expected bidders. The Department also opened correspondence upon the subject with the principal steel manufacturers of the country. The interest awakened by the discussion and investigations already had was stimulated somewhat by the influence of the Department, and resulted, when the bids were opened, in a contract with the Bethlehem Iron Company, under which a plant for the production of armor and gun-steel is being erected at Bethlehem, Pa., second to none in the world, it is believed. (Appendix, page 459.) The efforts of the Department were generously seconded by the Naval Appropriation Committees of the two Houses, the sum of $4,000,000 having been inserted in the appropriation acts for the purposes indicated.

The bids were opened on the 22d day of March last, and, coming at a time when the failure of Congress to make provision for the country's defense was being generally regretted, caused a feeling of quite universal congratulation throughout the country. It marked a most important step in the progress toward national independence, most sincerely desired, it is believed, by the larger portion of our people.

* * * * * * *

In like manner the contracts for armor and gun-steel are made at prices within 25 per cent. of the European price for the similar article, not greater than the difference in labor between the two countries, notwithstanding the heavy outlay for plant (estimated at $2,500,000) necessary to be made to undertake the contract.

Mr. TRACEY. Will the gentleman allow me a word by way of correction? I presume he would not intentionally make a misstatement.

Mr. BURNES. Certainly I would not. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TRACEY. It might as well be said here now that so far from its being the fact that the European governments have no government gun factories, Germany is the only one that has none. England has its gun factory at Woolwich; France, an army gun factory at Bourges and a naval gun factory at Ruelle; and Russia has at Obookhov a very large government gun factory.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, a word will suffice on that point. England maintains just about such an establishment as ours at Watervliet; but England buys the Krupp and Armstrong guns from private parties. None of the governments mentioned rely upon their national establishments for big guns. That is enough for that.

Mr. Chairman, I recall with emphasis to the hearts and consciences of members on the other side and doubly so to those on this side of the House, that in this country, as the Secretary of the Navy tells us, private enterprise has established at Bethlehem, Pa., a plant for the making of these guns, which plant is the best in the civilized world. Not only that, but the guns can be made within 25 per cent. of the cost of the Krupp guns and other European guns. So that we can make these guns for less money than they are made in Europe, allowing for the difference between American and European wages.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman will allow me to say that Secretary Whitney does not propose to assemble and fabricate his guns at Bethlehem, but has a gun factory here in the District of Columbia where that is to be done.

Mr. BURNES. I wish I had some military prestige, as I would like to meet the gentleman upon equal terms. [Laughter.] It makes no difference whether the material only for the guns or the guns are made at Bethlehem or elsewhere.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CUTCHEON. I do not suppose the gentleman wants to leave this matter under misimpression or misapprehension.

Mr. BURNES. I will make this statement and you can draw your own conclusions. I do not seek, of course, to make any misstatement or create a misimpression, but if there is any mistake it is by the Secretary of the Navy, for I adopt his own words; they are not my own so much as his. He tells you that American enterprise, American industry, American citizens, and American capital are now engaged in Bethlehem, Pa., with the prospect of creating the best establishment in the world, and of making guns within 25 per cent. of the guns in Krupp's works, and in other leading establishments in Europe.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And the gentleman ought to know that the steel forgings made there they propose to work up in the Government factory in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURNES. I rely entirely on what the Secretary says, and which has been read from his report. Beyond that I am not informed as to the facts. Indeed, I do not care to look beyond the information possessed by a Secretary of the Navy who has our united and unreserved confidence.

Now, then, friends of American industry, American enterprise, American labor, and American principles—and I am one of them—will we put the Government into a controversy and competition with private enterprise and capital? Shall the Government turn manufacturer, farmer, mechanic, or laborer when our own citizens are so engaged? Must the Government turn competitor in industrial pursuits when her wants can be supplied by private enterprise, and when the only incentive seems to spring from the greed of somebody who desires to contract now for $5,000,000 of steel?

The rights and dignity of American labor are involved in this present proceeding. He who labors merely under the restraints and exactions of Government employment is shut out from the field of independent enterprise, and too often becomes a mere machine, dwarfed in both mental and physical force. A government should do nothing that private enterprise and labor can as well perform, and I hope the day is soon to come when American workingmen in American shops and fields will supply their own Government and the governments of the earth with every article or commodity that their necessities may require. Especially do I hope that our own Government will cease enlarging its establishments, cease the spread of its paternal wings, and rely entirely upon our people for what it needs in peace or war, as it has to rely upon their courage and valor when the country is to be saved or defended.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that the Senate amendment proposes exactly what he suggests; that these products are to be manufactured in American establishments, in American shops, by American labor, except perhaps samples of high explosive?

Mr. BURNES. I say to the gentleman from Michigan that the Government should stand aloof, and let the people, let the private enterprise, and the spirit of American industry and progress have full play in the making of big guns as in the making of small-arms. Let the deathless spirit of our home labor, enterprise, and craft recreate our industrial pursuits and add to them every aid and incentive within the power of a just and equal government of the people.

Mr. CUTCHEON. We propose to manufacture the army guns just as the navy guns are now manufactured.

Mr. BURNES. You propose to do it by a Government establishment, over which the "popinjays" of the War Department will preside. You do not propose an opening of the doors to a full and free competition—citizen with citizen—but of the Government against all. American citizens, American capital, and American enterprise are incompetent to compete with the Government, especially for such things as the Government undertakes to manufacture.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I think the gentleman ought to withdraw the word he has applied to the ordnance officers at all events, because in that Department there are young men who are distinguished in their studies, and able and competent as any in the world.

Mr. BURNES. Let us see. As I understand, a representative of the War Department was before the Senate of the United States giving his views and advice in support of this measure. If I am in error in that statement the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is responsible.

I am here with testimony by half dozen or more witnesses that a very intelligent representative of the Department appeared before the Committee on Appropriations of the House, and upon a careful examination said that one and one-half million of dollars would be sufficient to purchase all the steel the Watervliet arsenal could manufacture or use in the next five years. Now you want to buy $5,000,000 worth of steel, as alleged by the advice of a representative of the Ordnance Department, and my friend, the gentleman from Michigan, has asked me to recall an accidental and playful word of criticism when I said the popinjays of the War Department would have charge of the proposed works. Referring to the man who gave advice to the committee of the Senate in favor of a $5,000,000 purchase of steel, as against the better and sounder advice given to the House committee in favor of $1,500,000, I am not quite sure that the term popinjay is not too flattering.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understood the gentleman from Michigan to say that the head of the Ordnance Department had appeared before the committee of the Senate. It was not the head of the Ordnance Department who appeared before the House committee, but Captain Smith, of the Department. It is quite possible therefore that one representative of the Department appeared before the Senate committee and another one before the House committee.

Mr. BURNES. It was Captain Smith who appeared before the committee of the House and satisfied all of us that an appropriation of $1,500,000 was an ample amount to purchase all the steel that could be used by the Watervliet arsenal within the next five years. Now we are told that some representative of the same bureau went to the Senate committee and asked for $5,000,000 instead of $1,500,000. My faith is in Captain Smith, and he is an able, honest, and fearless gentleman.

Mr. REED. But the gentleman from Michigan objected to the use of the word "popinjay."

Mr. BURNES. Well, that is a question of fact, and it ought to be susceptible of demonstration if one officer comes to the House committee, as Mr. Smith did, and another one goes to the Senate committee, as it is alleged, with a different story.

Mr. REED. I must say I do not think it is a question of fact, but rather of imagination.

Mr. BURNES. I will say that probably by the time the gentleman from Maine gets through with an investigation, he will find that there is more justice than imagination in the poetic designation of popinjay as applicable to the Ordnance Bureau, for if it appear that while one of its representatives is here advising an appropriation of one and a half millions of dollars to cover the expenditure for a certain purpose, there is another representing the same bureau making quite a different representation to the other branch of Congress, the designation is a mild form of well-merited criticism upon others than Mr. Smith (who impressed us most favorably), and who are perhaps his superior officers.

Mr. CUTCHEON. As a matter of fact the House bill was formulated and sent to the committee by the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau himself. But I understood the gentleman to use the word in the plural without reservation. Now I simply respond to that that the term should not be allowed to stand without contradiction, because we have as brilliant young men in the Ordnance Department as in any other department of the Government, Captain Smith and Captain Birnie.

Mr. BURNES. Well I do not know that "popinjay" is a very offensive term as applied to military men in times of peace. [Laughter.]

In reply to my friend from Maine, I wish to say that I have not attempted to do more than state the facts, and one of the facts is that Mr. Smith appeared before the committee of the House and represented that one and one-half millions of dollars would purchase all the steel that could be used at Watervliet in the next five years.

Mr. TRACEY. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURNES. Now, what is the point?

Mr. REED. That was stated before what committee?

Mr. BURNES. I merely refer you to the statement on the other side, to wit: the speech of my friend from Illinois on yesterday.

Mr. REED. But before what committee was the statement made?

Mr. BURNES. Before the Committee on Appropriations, and I refer the gentleman to his and my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. REED. Was that statement printed?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think it was all taken down.

Mr. BURNES. It has not been printed, I think.

Mr. TRACEY. I have the report here of the testimony.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Reference was made, I will state, to the purchase of $5,000,000 worth of steel. It was suggested that in purchasing that large amount they might get it at a reduced price, and like Toodles' coffin, it would be handy to have it in the house in case it was needed. I am interpolating Toodles' coffin. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I am afraid my friend from Ohio is interpolating the other suggestions also.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. There was no suggestion to the Committee on Appropriations by any ordnance officer of economy in the buying of $5,000,000 worth of steel except that in buying the large quantity better rates might be secured. There was no pretense that over $1,500,000 would be needed for use for the next five years.

Mr. REED. I understand that Mr. RANDALL two years ago recommended the purchase of $6,000,000 worth.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is an error. There were conditions under which quantities of steel could be purchased.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Were you not a member of the conference committee in the Forty-ninth Congress, which reported on this bill recommending $16,000,000?

Mr. REED. The very conference committee which recommended the $6,000,000.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We recommended it in what connection? Only in case it was needed in the fabrication of certain guns, but not as a bulk purchase of steel ingots or forgings for guns, without reference to the necessities of the service. The committee was not opposed to the manufacture or purchase of guns. The exact reverse is true, but they were opposed to steel rings. The purchase of five or six million dollars' worth of steel, without reference to whether it could be used or not, was objectionable.

Mr. REED. Steel rings!

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand the situation with which we had to deal, and I submit if the gentleman will confine himself to his own reservation and there indulge in his caustic remarks he will find ample opportunity to develop his ability. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I am not calling in question the wisdom nor underrating the necessity of making ample provision for purchasing steel and providing a suitable plant, and the bill we have reported does all that, but I am answering a question propounded to me.

The committee of the last Congress did report in favor of purchasing steel in ample quantity, but in connection with it, my friend will observe, provision was made for employing private enterprise, as well as public officers and agencies—in the procurement of guns. The objection to the bill then as now was that it provided for drawing upon the resources of the United States and not merely upon the ability of the Ordnance Department. And in case guns were produced by and at the cost, expense, and sole risk of private enterprise, and the gun or guns so produced should meet the public requirements and be equal to every requirement of the service in the matter of range, accuracy of fire, and power of endurance, a given number of such guns should be purchased no matter by whom produced, the point being to get the best gun and at the most reasonable price. That was the idea, and as a result, instead of drawing only upon the Ordnance Department or a few officers of that corps, we proposed to draw against the entire resources of this country, its genius, its capital, its patriotism, and its enterprise, and there was the rock upon which we split. We proposed to purchase all the steel we confessedly needed. Other gentlemen insisted that we should purchase three times as much or nothing. We proposed to provide an ample plant and have the Ordnance Corps go ahead and manufacture guns, or rather assemble them; but that was not acceptable unless we consented to shut out all individual enterprise or competition, and permitted a few officers to be the sole judges as to whether a private manufacturer should have any show to supply the Government with guns.

We had some hot exchanges because the gentleman from Maine thought he took a broader view of the situation than some of the rest of us, while we deemed his plan to be unjust; but that is not a matter of consequence now.

I beg the pardon of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES]. I did not desire to take him off the floor; but I want time enough to say that we asked the officers of the Ordnance Department who appeared before us during the past two months concerning the quantity of steel required by the Ordnance Corps. Captain Smith, who seems to be a clear-headed, earnest, and patriotic officer——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And who ought to be promoted.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And who doubtless merits promotion, as my friend suggests. I have confidence in his judgment; and he agreed with the committee except in one matter—he wanted the Ordnance Department to have original and exclusive jurisdiction in judging of all guns brought in competition with work invented or fabricated by that department; that they should decide first and finally as between the guns, and that there should be no appeal from their judgment and no one associated with them in making the tests.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Being experts.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Experts, indeed! Wisdom will not die with them, I think, in this country nor anywhere. This country abounds in men of genius ready and ripe in practical experience to produce anything that the exigencies of the public require, and if they can produce the best or a better gun there is neither wisdom nor justice in excluding them from the field of competition. But I will say that I asked Captain Smith, and though I do not profess to give the exact language used, I asked him this substantially: "Captain Smith, do you not think it would be a little hard on your competitors to have you sit as sole judge on the article brought into competition with the one produced by yourself?" Well, he admitted that there might be some reason in adding to the judges. And my friend will agree that if he and I were in competition that we would prefer that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] or the gentlemon from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] should sit in judgment along with me rather than that I should be the sole judge. Would you not?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rather think so.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think so, too. And that is what is proposed. We propose to draw upon scholarly men in the matter of passing upon the merits of guns produced by private enterprise, experienced and skilled in the art, so as to enable them to sit in judgment on certain tests and decide whether the inventive genius, ability, and patriotism of this country has produced a gun that this Government ought to purchase. Now, there was a difference between Captain Smith and ourselves; and I will here pay the tribute due to the worth of that officer to say that he appeared to be just and fair. I will not apply to him the term used by my friend from Missouri in the heat of debate, because in this instance it is not deserved.

I asked him about this: "Captain, would you not draw upon the resources of the whole country, its patriotism, capital, and inventive genius?" He replied, "Yes, sir; I think that would be proper;" and this House knows there is no surer agent than genius and capital combined, inspired by the hope of honor and profit. And the only difference of consequence between Captains Smith and Burnie and the committee was as to the limit of the jurisdiction of the Ordnance Bureau in a matter of passing judgment on the guns produced——

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I only obtained the floor with the consent of the gentleman from Missouri for the purpose of answering a question.

Mr. SAYERS. Did not Captain Smith say that one million and a half dollars' worth of steel was abundance at this time?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Undoubtedly he did; and the figures given were the result of careful calculations by the officers mentioned. There appeared to exist no trace of doubt in the mind of the representative of the Ordnance Corps that $1,500,000 for the purchase of steel would be sufficient to meet all requirements for five years. The purchase of the larger quantity was merely a question of possible advantage in making better terms.

Mr. SAYERS. Did not Captain Smith further state to the committee that a million and a half for steel was an abundance at this time?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have stated that. Undoubtedly he did, and the figures received from the Secretary of War show that it is abundant. He said that all they could possibly do they could do with the material that would be purchased with that appropriation.

Mr. CUTCHEON. There is not any doubt about that, if you want to buy only the steel that you need this year.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, the best military authority on this continent so far as I am concerned—the best military authority to me—is the distinguished soldier a part of whom is sleeping in the dust of Southern battle-fields and the balance of whom is occupying a seat on the other side of this House. I mean the distinguished soldier and statesman, General HENDERSON, of Iowa. He tells me he thinks I ought to withdraw the word "popinjay," and I do so very cheerfully, because I was so pleased and delighted with the frank and honorable demeanor of Captain Smith that on his account I can forgive the $5,000,000 Senate representative. Indeed, I was only led into the observation, which I now withdraw, because of a remark made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] from which I inferred that the Ordnance Bureau had sent representatives to talk one way here and a different way in the Senate. But I withdraw the remark, and take great pleasure in doing so.

The Committee on Military Affairs of this House, as shown by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] on yesterday, had indicated its disposition to favor unanimously the amendment of the Senate which is now under consideration. That committee introduced and reported a bill to this House which committed it to the support of the Senate proposition. It was the object of the Senate committee doubtless to avoid the House Committee on Appropriations. They well knew our rules, because we have been legislating and conferring with them for years and years under them, and conferring constantly in the line of the rules. They undertook to put this proposition upon a bill that they knew did not have jurisdiction of it. Now, even if it were true that the Senate may be said to have the power, as the gentleman from Maine claims it has, to put this provision upon any bill it pleases, we certainly have the same right to take it out of that bill in which the Senate placed it and put it in another bill where it belongs under the rules of the House.

The dignity and honor of the House, the integrity of its organization, and the autonomy of its committees demand that this latest effort at usurpation should be sternly rebuked. The Committee on Appropriations makes no appeal for itself. It is fighting a battle for the House, for right over wrong, for justice against injustice. It has given long and patient study to the subject of guns for fortifications (sometimes with the gentleman from Maine). It differs from the Senate committee and that committee knows it well. It has presented its views to the House in plain terms, and they are both conservative and patriotic.

The Committee on Appropriations (of the House) is conscious of duty well and properly performed, and it respectfully submits that these Senate amendments should be stricken from the bill where they now are.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], in forty-three minutes of a speech, undertakes to argue a point of order, and he says that by the rules of the House his committee—his present committee, not his former one—has jurisdiction over this amendment. The position taken by the gentleman can not be supported by a single argument, a single authority, a single precedent, or the judgment of a single official of this House. The Committee on Rules, when it came to take away from the Committee on Appropriations jurisdiction of certain appropriation bills and to distribute them among the other committees respectively, made a full and decisive report upon the subject. I need not remind the House that at the head of the committee making that report was the distinguished Speaker of this House, and that its membership includes Messrs. RANDALL, MILLS, REED, and CANNON. That Committee on Rules, then, reported the rules now in force to the House, and in doing so they said in their official report:

The fortification bill, being one relating jointly to Army and Navy fortifications and the general public defense, is left with the Committee on Appropriations.

Then the Committee on Rules, in the very act giving the Military Committee any power or jurisdiction over the subject of appropriations, emphatically negatived the present claim of the gentleman from Illinois. And when it was done where was the gentleman from Maine? Evidently he was at hand, agreeing and consenting to the report, or we should have heard from him in unmistakable hostility. But, sir, if that be not authority enough, as it certainly ought to be, I will call attention to a decision of Speaker CARLISLE, which finally and irrevocably settles this question of jurisdiction.

Mr. REED. I want to hear that.

Mr. BURNES. And I do not believe that even the learned logician from Maine can longer oppose the position we have taken after hearing the decision alluded to.

I read from the RECORD:

MANUFACTURE OF HEAVY ORDNANCE, ARMY WARFARE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 662) to encourage the manufacture of steel for modern army ordnance, armor, and other army purposes, and to provide heavy ordnance adapted to modern army warfare, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, I make the same point of order with reference to this bill that the gentleman from Michigan made with regard to the preceding bill, that under clause 11 of the eleventh rule, which provides—

"That all proposed legislation relating to the military establishment and the public defense, including the appropriations for its support and for that of the Military Academy, shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs"— that this bill should be so referred.

Mr. REED. I ask that the bill be read for the information of the House.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. REED. I make the same parliamentary inquiry as to this bill that was made with reference to the other; that is to say, if it goes to the Committee on Appropriations, will that committee be at liberty to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that so much of this bill as relates to the procurement of ordnance—guns—has usually, the Chair thinks, been included in the sundry civil appropriation bill when any appropriation was made for that purpose at all, and the remainder of the bill, providing armor for fortifications, is a subject over which the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction by the express terms of the rule of the House. The Chair thinks, therefore, this bill properly belongs to the Committee on Appropriations.

Could anything be plainer or more decisive? This bill almost in terms was before the distinguished Speaker of the House when the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Maine was called to the proposition, and the Speaker held that it was referable properly to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Missouri regard that as a precedent for his action?

Mr. BURNES. Will the gentleman from Maine repeat his question?

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Missouri regard this as an authority upon this question?

Mr. BURNES. I certainly do, for it settles the question of jurisdiction by the highest authority of the House, and leaves us no alternative but to maintain the integrity of our rules and the jurisdictions of our committees or ignobly surrender to an impudent assumption of the Senate——

Mr. REED. And that, therefore, upon a point of order this Senate amendment would be stricken off?

Mr. BURNES. Well, I do not say that.

Mr. REED. Why not, if that is a decision of this question?

Mr. BURNES. Because the point I make is this: That the Senate has willfully disregarded our rules and attempted to confer jurisdiction in violation of them.

Mr. REED. Oh, "willfully."

Mr. BURNES. In my judgment, willfully and impudently; for they knew our rules—knew the House alone could originate bills of appropriation, and had through the whole of the Forty-ninth Congress contested face to face with the representatives of the House committee in conference. Hence, I say it willfully placed this proposition upon the Army appropriation bill because the Military Committee had formed and expressed an opinion with regard to this kind of legislation more favorable to it than that which the Committee on Appropriations had declared.

Mr. REED. That is, they put it on this bill because they thought they could pass it better in this way than the other?

Mr. BURNES. Exactly.

Mr. REED. And that you regard as a violation of the rules of the House?

Mr. BURNES. I think it is. The intention was bad. With full knowledge of our rules and rights as an equal under the Constitution the Senate proposes to indirectly originate an appropriation bill contrary to the Constitution and contrary to rules which, as to this subject, they are bound to take notice of.

Mr. REED. Can the Senate violate the rules of the House?

Mr. BURNES. Technically, we may say the Senate can do as it pleases. I started out with that proposition.

Mr. REED. I wish you had kept on with it, because if you had you would have been safe.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to correct the gentleman from Missouri in justice to the Senate.

Mr. BURNES. My time is rapidly coming to a close. The gentleman can occupy his own time hereafter.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether he has examined the matter so as to be able to state to the House the historical aspect of this question; that is to say, exactly how this bill, which is an exact counterpart of the one reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and now on the Calendar, ever got to that committee, so as to be reported back to the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman from Missouri will allow me, I can give the exact historical facts on that question.

Mr. BURNES. I see my time is about to expire. Sir, I like equity and justice as well as law; and I think in view of the fact that I have been considerably interrupted while on the floor I ought, by common consent, to have ten minutes longer.

Mr. REED. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] be allowed to proceed ten minutes longer. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, I hope the gentleman from Missouri will allow me to answer the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman will have his time. The history of this bill is easily told. I can merely state it historically, as suggested by my friend from Arkansas. My friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, was during the Forty-ninth Congress a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but at the opening of this Congress he was transferred from that committee to the chairmanship of the Committee on Military Affairs. While a member of the Committee on Appropriations he was a part and parcel of the struggle between that committee representing the House and the committee on the part of the Senate. He was familiar with the efforts which were made; he knew the position of the Senate and the position of the House; and I would be doing great injustice to the parliamentary knowledge of that distinguished gentleman if I should say he was not familiar with the rules of the House. Be that as it may, the gentleman, having taken part in this controversy, is transferred to a position at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs; and his committee—I can not say just now who introduced the bill—reports a bill the counterpart of the Senate amendments. All of us understand how references of bills are frequently obtained in violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In justice to myself—I do not ask anything but simple justice—I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that while I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations no such controversy arose as the one we have here to-day, and no such question as that involved in the Cutcheon bill ever presented itself during the whole time I was upon that committee. This is an entirely different question from any that came up while I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BURNES. Here is the bill which, if I had time to read it, would not be in harmony with the statement of the gentleman. This question was before us throughout the Forty-ninth Congress; and what may have been the position of the gentleman I need not undertake to state; but that the bill was before that committee through the Forty-ninth Congress goes without saying, because everybody ought to know it as a fact.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The point is, and I do not want my friend to get away from it in order to do me injustice—the point is simply this that the Military Committee reported the Tracey or Cutcheon bill, providing for the establishment of a gun factory, and authorizing the purchase of steel forgings. That is all the question presents. But the question that the gentleman from Missouri raises is that the bill did not belong to the Committee on Military Affairs. Now, I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that no such issue came up in the last Congress, or in the prior Congress, or in any Congress of which I have been a member. It was not then, is not now, a question whether such mode of dealing with the subject, in the shape of amendments, belonged to the Army bill or to the Appropriations Committee. What I hold is that what is known as the "Cutcheon or Tracey" bill was reported, after being referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee had jurisdiction, and properly reported the bill. But no such issue as my friend suggests has ever arisen during my service in Congress.

Mr. BURNES. Now, the point before the committee is plain. Conferees are to be appointed upon the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs to represent the House in a conference with the Senate upon these amendments, and upon one of them specifically, which proposes to appropriate $5,000,000 for the purchase of steel. That is the issue, and that this House will do well to bear in mind, because it is not competent to say what the Speaker may or may not do, but if conferees from the Military Committee should be appointed the novel spectacle will be presented of having excluded as conferees those who under the rules of the House have the subject-matter of the conference in charge, and furthermore we shall recognize thereby the right of the Senate to originate an appropriation bill in lieu of one lawfully authorized under the Constitution.

In other words, the House by constitutional procedure provides for a fortification appropriation bill. That bill the Senate ignores, and makes—originates—a fortification appropriation bill of its own, and tacks it to a bill having no jurisdiction over the subject.

It can not be disguised that the Senate has knowledge of a quondam courtesy in the House by which they expect conferees on the part of the House from a committee friendly to the amendments—committed in advance to them. Shall the scheme be carried out? Shall the rights of the House be handed over bodily to the Senate and $5,000,000 be taken from the Treasury and invested in steel that the Government will not need in a decade of years?

If this mode of legislation is now recognized, or if conferees favorable to it be appointed and thereby the success of Senatorial cunning over the rules and honor of the House should be secured, it will not be the fault of the Committee of the House on Appropriations, who protest against it and oppose the steel. [Laughter.] I mean the purchase of the steel, for I do not want my language to be offensive to any member of the House or Senate.

Mr. MAISH. The Committee on Appropriations is in favor of something to that effect themselves.

Mr. BURNES. The Committee on Appropriations has its bill on the Calendar. That bill, when the proper time comes, is to be considered. The House has jurisdiction of the subject. We will all have something to say when that bill comes up for consideration. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Let us simply say that the Committee on Appropriations has taken jurisdiction, has reported a bill which is upon the Calendar ahead of the military bill, and the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Illinois can offer the Senate amendment as an amendment to that bill, and test the judgment of the House through the channels which the rules have established for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I owe the House an apology for this protracted effort in discharge of a duty to an absent friend. I know he will be grieved if this House, in which he has served so long and with such great distinction and usefulness, should neglect to protect its rights or its honor from this shameless assault. He has seen the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations invaded so often and to such a degree that I doubt not he has reached the solemn conclusion that another invasion of its powers—an invasion as now proposed—and the committee will be a thing of the past. Gentlemen who voted to distribute certain appropriation bills to other committees at the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress are no doubt now in the mood of that devisee in the will case, alluded to by our genial friend from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], who, owing to the trouble of conducting the contest of the case in court, almost wished that "Dad hadn't died." So you gentlemen are no doubt almost sorry that you ever invaded the jurisdiction of that committee and took from the Appropriations Committee of the House the military bill and gave it to the Military Committee, to say the least of it.

Mr. Chairman, for your indulgence and for that of the Committee of the Whole House I sincerely thank you and them. I have tried to avoid wounding any one, and hope I have succeeded. Regarding the honor of the House as involved, I have not been able to be as gentle and forbearing as I trust my habit is; but as saintliness in manners and expression is not always expected in our sudden debates, I feel confident I will be pardoned for every word that may seem either harsh or unkind to any one. [Applause.]

Mr. HOOKER. I have not——

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOOKER. For how long?

Mr. REED. About five minutes.

Mr. HOOKER. Very well.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to reply to the gentleman from Missouri upon the question involved in the point of order. If I was not able to convince the House last night, I shall certainly not be able to convince it to-day; but I do desire to refer to one statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] as to the use of the expression "steel rings." I do not know what he alludes to, but I beg leave to call his attention to the fact that the testimony of Captain Smith, who is now entirely exonerated from the charge of being a "popinjay," covers one point.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I did not desire to intimate that there was any steel ring or any tendency in that direction.

Mr. REED. The tenor of your remark was precisely in that line, and it supplies precisely and exactly the point I desire to speak of. Now, Captain Smith has been rehabilitated not only by the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, but also by the statement of the gentleman from Missouri, and Captain Smith's testimony has, I think, contrary to the statement which has been made in this House, been printed. That statement is not that a million and a half is sufficient, but simply that that would occupy the factory for a certain time in building certain sorts of guns; but Captain Smith makes a plain declaration that even this appropriation of a million and a half dollars would not prevent all competition. In other words, it would send all that money to one single establishment and prevent the Government of the United States from having the benefit of competition, thereby subjecting it to all the evils of a steel ring if it were instituted.

His proposition was two millions and a half; but I can not well understand how he did not make the larger proposition, for he knew that he was in the presence of a hostile committee, a committee that took knowledge of his functions that he was one of the competitors, as they say. Why, as I understand it, the Ordnance Bureau is made to judge and decide upon this question of guns after examining them all, and if they have taken upon themselves any other functions they ought to be turned out of the place and more suitable and proper men put in their place; but after Captain Smith has been complimented as he has been by the gentleman from Ohio and by the gentleman from Missouri, I take it for granted that he can not be charged with occupying a preposterous position and being a judge in the employ of the Government and passing judgment upon his work in competition with that of others.

As I understand it, the ordnance board has the duty to construct guns and to superintend their construction. Why in the world are they not suitable judges of the propriety of other work submitted to them? They are responsible for it. The Committee on Appropriations have presented a bill here which establishes one of those commissions which I think are the pest of modern civilization, one of those commissions which are created for the purpose of getting rid of the constituted officers of the Government.

Because certain men have discovered that they can not satisfy the regular Government officials, therefore it is attempted to establish another board that they will satisfy, and this is urged upon the ground of fairness. I tell you there is no fairness about this system unless it is carried to this extent and create a new board for every dissatisfied man.

We know that all those who can not satisfy the board want a new one. Why, the original bill that was prepared by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations actually proposes that there shall be guns made by the Navy Department and by the War Department, and that there should be a contest between them and outsiders, and if the outsiders beat, the outsiders should have an appropriation, and if the Navy and Army beat them they should not.

Now, I have been over this matter somewhat. It is my "reservation" to a certain extent, if I may be allowed to quote the language of the gentleman from Ohio, because I had the honor of serving upon a commission that was appointed to examine into this matter and it did examine into it, and I am certain that I did examine it faithfully on my part.

I want to state to this House that ever since the time this commission was formed the object of the Appropriation Committee has been, as I think, to prevent the building of guns. I mean that has been the result of their action.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. HOOKER. How much longer would you require to finish your remarks?

Mr. REED. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy, but I will take another opportunity to address the House and will not further trespass on the gentleman's time.

Mr. HOOKER. I listened with very great attention to the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] yesterday, to the argument made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and to the argument made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] this morning. And when we come to consider what is the question before the House the speeches delivered would strike the stranger as singularly malapropos with regard to the subject-matter under discussion.

What is the question before the committee? It is simply a question of non-concurrence in certain amendments which have been presented by the Senate to a bill which had been introduced into this House, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back to this House, passed by the House and sent to the Senate, and to which that body has seen fit to put certain amendments.

Now, it was said by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and repeated to-day by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] that in putting these amendments upon this bill, which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and sent to the Senate, the Senate has been guilty of an infringement of the rules of the House, and has done something which is derogatory to the honor and dignity of the House. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the proposition is a singular one. Under the Constitution the Senate and the House have equal rights in matters of legislation, and whenever a subject-matter has been introduced into this House, referred to the appropriate committee, reported back by the committee, and passed by the House, it goes to the Senate with all the rights accruing under the Constitution, and, under the organization of the Senate, to that dignified body, to make any amendments, alterations, and changes that to it may seem proper.

Never before in the history of the legislation of this or any other country, or in the mind of any man who claimed to be a student of parliamentary law, has it been asserted that the independent action of a co-ordinate legislative department of the Government was an infringement of the rules of the other House. How do they exist under the Constitution? Sir, the Senate of the United States, disregarding the principle of numbers, consists of men elected by sovereign States to represent those sovereign States, each State in the Union being entitled to two Senators; and in that august body, under the terms of the Constitution, Delaware with her 77,000 inhabitants, with but a single Representative upon the floor of this House, from the inauguration of the Constitution down to the present day—Delaware, I say, in the Senate stands upon perfect equality with New York, with her five millions of people.

Ay, more, Mr. Chairman, we have heard a good many criticisms of vetoes and discussions of the veto power and opinions, and the impropriety of the exercise of that power; but the Senate has a veto upon the action of the House, the House has a veto upon the action of the Senate, and the Executive has a veto upon both, all being designed, in the language of the great interpreter of the Constitution, to strike another key in the popular voice and bring it out in fuller and more perfect harmony.

I have said, sir, that Delaware, with her population of 77,000, stands in the Senate of the United States upon a perfect equality with New York, with her population of 5,000,000. More, Mr. Chairman, not only has each State in the Union an equal representation upon the floor of the Senate, but that equal representation can not be changed except with the assent of every State in the Union, so that upon a proposition to change it Delaware, with her 77,000 inhabitants, has a right to put her veto upon all the other States and the people of all the States in the Union. The change can not be made as long as Delaware says, "I forbid."

The Senate, therefore, thus constituted—emphatically denominated by Mr. Calhoun the favorite of the Constitution—the Senate thus constituted, representing, as it does, the States and disregarding the principle of numbers, when it comes to the question of the right to legislate has its own powers, with which this House has no right or authority to interfere, any more than the Senate has right or authority to interfere with the rules of the House. I was therefore astonished when my honorable friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], who is usually so calm, and cool, and circumspect, and sensible about everything, almost tore a passion to tatters yesterday when he got to talking about the infringement by the Senate of the dignity of the House; and the ardor of his speech, and the eloquence of his speech, and the vehemence of his speech has been admirably imitated to-day by the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES]. Those gentlemen seem to want to alarm the House with the idea that the Senate intends some great encroachment upon the powers of the House.

I must confess that I am unable to see it when I come to scan the purport of the amendments which the Senate has proposed to this bill, and more especially am I not alarmed either by the war-like manner of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], or the terrible, gigantic, and menacing aspect of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] [laughter]—more especially, I say, am I not alarmed when I look at the Senate amendment and see that it simply proposes the question whether or not there shall be an appropriation made for the military arsenal at Watervliet; especially when I remember that these honorable gentlemen, who seem now, with all their military ardor, shivering in their shoes over the encroachments of the Senate, have absolutely given their assent to a bill which lies here on the desks of members, accompanied with a report by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], which proposes an appropriation of $19,000,000 for the same purpose.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to come back now to the actual question before the committee.

What is the motion of my honorable friend the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs? It is a motion to non-concur in the Senate amendments and appoint a committee of conference to confer with the Senate upon the subject of those amendments. That is all. That is the simple proposition, and yet the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] representing the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] say, "You must not consent to the committee of conference, or if you do you must not appoint upon it any member of the committee which brought the bill in and passed it through the House, because they may have the idea that under the rules of the House this measure is proper." Sir, as I said before, all this debate in my judgment is premature. After you had non-concurred in the Senate amendments and had appointed your committee of conference, and after that committee had made its report, then, upon the question of agreeing to that report would have been the proper time and the proper place for this debate.

If you can not confide in the men who are appointed at first, the House has a right to change its conferees; and I say, sir, that there is nothing in the argument which has been brought forward here, that there is a disposition on the part of the Senate to infringe upon the authority and the powers of the House. I am not alarmed by the amendments of the Senate, and more particularly ought not those gentlemen to be alarmed who belong to a committee which has reported a bill appropriating $19,000,000 for the same purpose as that proposed in the Senate amendments.

But, sir, it is said that this is a subject-matter which properly pertains under the rules of the House and under parliamentary law to the Committee on Appropriations. For a long time in the history of the Congress of the United States the Committee on Appropriations dominated every other committee in this House; for a long time the representatives of the people sat here and permitted that committee to dominate and control every question, because it held the purse-strings and was enabled to give or to withhold the money for this purpose, that purpose, or the other purpose, as it saw proper, and no other committee possessed the power to make any appropriation until the rules were amended in the Forty-ninth Congress, and the power of bringing in appropriation bills was divided among the committees of the House.

The Committee on Appropriations had for many long years assumed to itself almost the entire functions of legislation; it had had an absolute power in this House which nobody had dared to resist, and had used that power to such an extent that finally the House rose in its strength and said: "We will divide those great powers which you have so long held in your single hand and have used with such despotic sway; we will divide and distribute them among the respective committees to which they properly belong." Sir, it has been said that the possession of power always draws power to it. It is well known to those who are familiar with the history of this contest in the Congress of the United States that the Committee on Appropriations fought that division of power.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], who gained what legislative experience and knowledge and skill he may possess while he was a pupil in the Committee on Appropriations, was one of those who opposed the division of that power. The change was made, but his great services are not lost to the country, because he is still at the head of an important committee of this House, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the proper management of which is so important and so essential to the business interests of the country.

But, sir, I am surprised at the gentleman's present position. He goes back to his old love, and insists that you are going to rob the Committee on Appropriations of some of its rightful power if you agree to the proposition of my friend from Illinois to non-concur in the Senate amendments and appoint a committee of conference in accordance with the respectful request of the co-ordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government.

When we look at the rules themselves as they have been amended—though I do not consider this a question now to be discussed, but inasmuch as it has been discussed I will refer to it—when you look at the terms of the rule, what do you find? The argument of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], like that of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], has been based upon the theory that the power to appropriate for fortifications belongs under the rules to the Committee on Appropriations, as if the statement of that proposition and the reading of the rule did not definitively settle that question. Nobody has ever challenged that proposition.

Everybody concedes that appropriations upon the subject of fortifications belong to the Committee on Appropriations. What is the meaning of "fortifications?" The word means defenses established on the seacoast or in the interior—forts equipped and manned. But forts are equipped and manned oftentimes by soldiers with small arms in their hands, as well as by the thundering guns that line the parapet of the fortification. And would you say that because there has been confided to the Committee on Appropriations the right to make appropriations for fortifications hence there is no power in any other committee to provide for the making of a gun, small or large, for the defenses of those fortifications?

The mistake—and I wish to call special attention to it—is in the misconstruction of the word "fortifications." Fortifications are simply a part of the defenses of the country—not all. The term "public defense," as used in the twelfth clause of Rule XI is broad and emphatic. Under that clause of the rule "all proposed legislation" relating "to the military establishment and the public defense, including the appropriations for its support, and for that of the Military Academy," are referred "to the Committee on Military Affairs." All legislation relating to the public defense! The language in this case is broad, generic, comprehensive, all-sweeping, including alike defenses on the water's edge and defenses in the interior. The language in reference to the Committee on Appropriations is narrow and circumscribed—"fortifications"—a single specific and distinct subject-matter, which is still left, as we all concede, in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. There is the distinction, palpable, absolute, uncontradicted—a distinction which no man can question.

By this division of power between the two committees all bills relating to the "public defense" are referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Therefore, the bill introduced by the gentleman from the Albany district of New York [Mr. TRACEY] and the bill of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] were properly referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and received its consideration. The committee reported back a measure to the House, and it was passed. No objection was made, either when the bill was introduced or when it was brought back or when it was passed. Where were then the guardians of the Appropriations Committee who are now so jealous of its rights? Where were then the guardians of the dignity and honor of this House when they allowed this assumption of power and authority? There was no question raised about the power of this committee to pass upon every question that it did pass upon. The Watervliet provision was embodied in an appropriation of $720,000 for the purpose of perfecting the arsenal at that point. The other amendment of the Senate refers to the question of the purchase of material for larger guns.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House very briefly to the amendments which the Senate has offered to this bill. The Senate, in considering the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army, made many amendments, all of which—thirty-six in number, I believe—have been non-concurred in on the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, with the exception of two, one of which refers to the establishment of the gun factory at Watervliet, and the other to the purchase of the material for the construction of heavy artillery. These are the two amendments of the Senate upon which gentlemen say the House ought not now to take any action at all; for that is the effect of it. I do not see how the House can dispose of these questions except upon a motion to non-concur.

We should not concur in them, say the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES]. What then do they want us to do? The Senate has put on these amendments in the exercise of its functions and powers, as to which we are no judges, upon the same principle on which it is claimed the Senate can make no judgment as to the rules which shall govern this House. If that be true, as argued by the gentleman from Missouri, then we have no right to say to the Senate, "You have put upon this bill amendments in contravention of the rules of our House." In what attitude do you gentlemen stand who feel so keenly and sensitively the dignity and honor of this House, and want to defend it against the Senate and against one of your own committees organized in this House? In what attitude do you stand? You allowed the bill to be introduced; you referred it to this committee; it was reported back; you passed it without a word of dissent, so far as that bill was concerned.

And now, when the Senate, acting equally within the scope of its authority, assumes to put upon it a simple appropriation, an appropriation of $720,000, for the purpose of fitting up the military arsenal at Watervliet, N. Y., and proposes to appropriate $5,000,000 to purchase steel for the manufacture of heavy ordnance, you say, "Oh, no; we can not admit that; it is an infringement upon the rights of the House." Is it an infringement? The House has, under the rules, the power to determine the question as to whether it shall be referred to one committee or the other. And what notice had the Senate, if the Chairman please, that the House doubted the power of the Senate to make such an amendment as would be germane to the subject-matter of the bill? They have simply proposed these two amendments and I call the attention of the House to them.

Now, sir, it has been said by the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] that we ought not to concur in the amendments of the Senate, nor ought we to take action to non-concur. What should we do, then? Is the legislation upon this important subject to stop? Does the gentleman from Missouri or the gentleman from Texas intend to press the fortifications bill introduced by the Committee on Appropriations to a determination at this session of Congress? Are they prepared to say now they intend to propose it for consideration, to press it to consideration, a bill which, instead of $720,000 appropriation for the arsenal at Watervliet and $5,000,000 to purchase steel for heavy ordnance, appropriates large amounts of money aggregating a total sum of $19,000,000?

Mr. SAYERS. Will my friend allow me to correct him just there? I merely want to state that there is no appropriation of $5,000,000 for steel, but of one and one-half millions of dollars only, instead of five.

Mr. HOOKER. I understand; but the aggregate amount of the bill is nineteen millions of dollars. You say it is to cover a period of thirteen years in which to expend it.

Mr. SAYERS. And I said another thing, that the $19,000,000 is not all appropriated now. It goes through a series of years; and they are to come to Congress and get the appropriations just as they are needed. Congress retains the control of the whole matter.

Mr. HOOKER. So they do under the Senate amendments in the bill now pending before us. Unless the man from whom the steel is bought submits to tests, and these tests are satisfactory, not a dollar can be paid.

Now, it was hardly fair and candid in the honorable gentleman from Missouri, who has assailed the Military Committee upon the ground that they may favor the idea that there is power in this House to refer questions of defense to that committee—he is hardly actuated by his usual fairness when he introduces a Senate bill here which proposes the appropriation of $120,000,000, and endeavors to frighten the committee from its propriety by the enormous aggregate of the appropriations suggested in that bill. I say he was not as fair as he usually is in all matters of discussion. It is an effort of the Appropriations Committee to hold on to all the power which it has, and to deny to the other committees, that resisted its advances, the right to exercise the functions that these various committees have intrusted to them by the rules of the House.

But, Mr. Chairman, in support of the position I take, there has been a memorable case lately decided in this House. The present permanent Chairman of this committee decided it when the question was raised as to the right and power of the Committee on Indian Affairs to make an appropriation to pay a final judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States. The very gentleman who presides in the chair as permanent Chairman [Mr. SPRINGER], when the point of order was made that the question belonged to the Appropriations Committee, decided, and properly decided—pari passu, a case exactly like this—that the power belonged to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Appropriations Committee then, as they do here, claimed the power and right to control the question of appropriating money even to pay this judgment of the court of last resort in this country. But the Chair held, and rightly, that the question there presented belonged to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment? In regard to making this appropriation, I desire to call the attention of the committee to a report of a conference committee in the last Congress on this very subject. Mr. RANDALL, then speaking for the conference committee, says:

> The Senate bill involves, as the majority of the House conferees construe it, an expenditure approaching or above $40,000,000, while the House bill, which the majority of the conferees of the House were willing to adopt, appropriates seventeen millions.

This is his own language.

Mr. HOOKER. Now, it will be seen, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the amount which has been put upon this bill by the amendments of the Senate, whether rightfully or wrongfully we will not now stop to discuss, that the only way of determining the question presented, as to whether or not the amendments are germane, and should receive the consideration of the House, is to submit to or acquiesce and respond to the request of the Senate to appoint a conference committee, and let that committee acting in conjunction with the committee of the Senate examine and report upon the subject-matter.

It will be found that there are paragraphs numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, of amendment No. 35, which embrace these items of expenditure. I am free to say that there is one of these amendments, in the following words—which should go properly to the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, which introduced the bill for the armament of fortifications and coast defenses generally. It may be that there are others, but however that question may be, all that is asked is that this matter shall be non-concurred in, that it shall go to the conference committee, and that we will confer upon the matter and make report to the House; and when we do, then comes the question as to whether the House will adopt whatever report the conference committee may see proper to advocate.

> SEC. 7. For the purchase of submarine controllable torpedoes or torpedoes and torpedo-boats controllable from shore and adapted to coast defense, $100,000—

Recommendations will then come from the committee, but I do not see what they can effect, unless the object be to block the legislation of this body and leave this country in the condition in which it now is. It was stated in a memorable speech made by one of the most distinguished Senators in the other branch of this Government only a short time ago—a year ago last winter—that there was one Government in Europe, Italy, effete Italy, which had one armed vessel that could enter the ports of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, and sweep everything with destruction and desolation, and that the whole Navy of the United States would be powerless to resist it, even if that Navy was assembled at a single point. Now, what of our defenses?

As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] says, we are not in a condition now in this country to put up great guns on our coast and protect the great ports of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, and all others. What guns have we in this country? What fortifications have we to protect the ports? As I have said, Italy itself possesses one single armed vessel, with guns of so formidable a character, with a capacity to carry so far, and with such destructive projectiles that the United States Navy, if assembled, could not resist it. Shall we stand in that attitude? Shall we remain so naked? It may be there are no wars or rumors of wars threatened, on the horizon, but, sir, are we not to make any preparation until the war begins?

Sir, it is a very well known fact that whenever nations tend to war now, with the telegraph wires which belt the earth and the submarine cables which lie on the bottom of the sea, intelligence being quickly transmitted from one part of the world to another, that the very best way to maintain peace is not to wait until war is declared before preparation is made. It must be made before. We have a vast seacoast, which stretches from New York to Galveston and from California to Alaska, to defend, with an army of only 25,000 which this bill proposes to provide for. With this vast coast to defend by an armament by sea and by land, though our numbers be great and our resources unquestioned, our population amounting now to over 60,000,000 of people, we might be powerless to resist even the feeblest of powers that the events of the day might bring us in conflict with.

I say, therefore, that unless it be the purpose and object to obstruct consideration of this question by the bill from the Fortifications Committee, which is intended to present the very same purposes and objects, it appears to me to prevent legislation upon this important subject. The very object seems to be to prevent the passage of the military bill itself, upon which the Senate in its wisdom has seen fit to put this proposition. The whole proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is simply to non-concur in the amendments and confer with the Senate in reference to these amendments which are objected to in the House. As my colleague from Illinois has said, under our rules we have the right to consider questions of military defense.

What is the meaning of the word "defense?" It means a general defense; and the word "fortification" means and designates an altogether different mode of defense. It grants, therefore, to the Military Committee jurisdiction of all questions relating to public defense—unlimited, unrestrained, and unconditioned—and reserves to the Committee on Appropriations simply to decide and determine the appropriate and proper mode for the fortifications. It does not involve the construction of arms, small or great. It does not involve the construction of artillery either to be used for the forts or for the general defense of the country. The Military Committee is intrusted with the general defense.

I say therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the committee and the House can not extricate themselves from the position in which they now stand save by voting for the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and appointing this committee of conference, and when their report is returned to this House to say whether for any reason suggested to it that it will accept or reject the report coming from the Military Committee.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the position which I have assumed upon this question is unanswerable, and that it has up to this time not been answered.

Upon the question of the power of the two Houses conferring with each other upon subjects about which they disagree I desire to have read as a part of my remarks an extract from Mr. Cushing on "parliamentary law" in reference to the powers of committees of the two Houses conferring with each other, and before the Clerk shall read this I will simply ask that the other be printed in the RECORD.

I say, therefore, in closing, that by a construction of the rules the language of the rule itself reserves to the Committee on Appropriations the measures relating to fortifications, but it confers upon it, no more than to other committees of the House, powers which are not stated in the rule.

I ask that paragraphs 822 and 827 in Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies be read, and reserve the remainder of my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 822. It is not always a matter of indifference, even when there may be a fit occasion for a conference, at what time, or by which House, the conference is requested; for, as it is the duty of the two Houses, on all occasions, to maintain a good understanding and co-operation with one another, and to allow each to proceed, in the discharge of their respective duties, with perfect freedom and independence, it would not be proper for one, by means of a conference, to interfere with, and anticipate, or endeavor to influence, the proceedings of the other, until that other has first acted upon the subject in question. Thus, while a bill which has passed in one House and been sent to the other is there pending and under consideration, it is irregular for the former to take any notice of the proceedings in the latter, and to demand a conference thereon. This rule, which lies at the foundation of the freedom and independence of the two Houses, as regards one another, was established at a very early period of parliamentary history, and though originally restricted in its terms to bills, the principle of it is so obviously convenient and proper that for a long course of years it has been extended and applied as a general rule to resolutions and all other matters which have been communicated from the one House to the other and are there pending and under consideration. For example, if the Commons, at a conference, communicate a resolution to the Lords and request the concurrence of the latter, they must wait until some answer is returned before demanding another conference on the same subject. When the Lords are prepared with an answer it is for them to demand a conference with the Commons for the purpose of communicating it to them.

SEC. 827. When a message is sent from the one House to the other for a conference, it is received, treated, and acted upon, in the same manner as other messages; and, in order to preserve harmony and a good correspondence between the two Houses, it should be answered as soon as the convenience of the House will admit. The House of which the conference is requested may simply agree, and it would be unparliamentary to refuse a conference which was demanded on parliamentary grounds; or it may disagree; in such case, the reason for disagreeing should be stated; or if it is the House of Commons, of which the conference is requested, it may agree to the conference, but disagree as to the time or place, in which case the reasons should also be stated, and the Lords will thereupon, if they see fit, appoint some other time or place. But it does not appear to be according to parliamentary usage nor would it consist with convenience, to agree, on condition, or with some amendment or modification, as to the subject-matter of the conference; such an agreement may be considered as a refusal of conference, and treated as such. Thus, where in answer to a request of the Commons for a conference, the Lords informed them by message that they agreed to the conference "always provided, that nothing be offered at the conference that may anyways concern their lordships' judicature," the Commons resolved "that by the Lords' answer there is no grant of a conference upon the matter, as it was desired by this House," and also that a conference be desired with the Lords on the subject of that answer. When a proposition for a conference has been considered, the answer is to be returned by a message; if agreed to at once, the answer may be returned by the same messengers; if disagreed to at once, either wholly or as to time or place, the most regular course seems to be for the House disagreeing to return an answer by messengers of its own; if the answer is not resolved upon immediately, it must be returned in that manner, whatever it may be.

Mr. HOOKER. I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eighteen minutes remaining.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to have an understanding as to the length of this debate, and I ask unanimous consent that we agree upon a limit.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest that there are several gentlemen who desire to speak on this question, and I think the debate ought to continue for an hour and a half or two hours, say until 4 o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If it can be agreed upon, so that the House will be bound by the action of the committee, that a vote shall be taken upon this amendment in the House at 4 o'clock, I shall have no objection to the debate continuing until that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please state his proposition definitely?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent that the final vote shall be taken in the House upon the motion to non-concur at 4 o'clock.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before that is submitted I wish to ask the gentleman how the time is to be divided? It is now twenty minutes past 2 o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am willing that the time shall be equally divided.

Mr. CANNON. Why not discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of this bill and let it be considered in the House, and then take the vote at 4 o'clock, not only upon the motion to non-concur, but also upon the resolution, which somebody no doubt will offer, expressing the sense of the House that the House conferees should not consider these particular amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am willing to accept the suggestion of my colleague from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. That arrangement can not be made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill and the Senate amendments thereto, that all general debate upon the bill and amendments close at 4 o'clock, that at that hour the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and the final vote taken upon the motion to non-concur.

Mr. SAYERS. And also upon an amendment to be offered to the motion to non-concur, or a resolution, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 10234, the Army appropriation bill, that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the pending proposition and amendments thereto, that the debate thereon be closed at 4 o'clock, and that the previous question be then considered as ordered.

Mr. CANNON. We may want to offer some other amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless that right be reserved, it will be cut off by this motion.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] how the time between now and 4 o'clock is to be divided. Is one half of it to be allowed to those in favor of his motion and the other half to those opposed to it?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] I will say that although most of the time has been occupied in opposition to the position of the Committee on Military Affairs, I am willing that the time from now until 4 o'clock shall be equally divided.

Mr. SAYERS. Let it also be understood, Mr. Speaker, that I shall have an opportunity to offer a resolution in lieu of the one proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TRACEY. Will that be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks to modify the request of the gentleman from Illinois, so as to allow an amendment or resolution to be voted upon in connection with this proposition, but not to be debated beyond the hour indicated.

Mr. BUCHANAN. To that part I object. I will not consent to a limitation of time upon a resolution which is not offered and the terms of which I do not know.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do I understand the gentleman from New Jersey to object?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman objects.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman from New Jersey wants to understand what is the resolution to be offered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield to allow the proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] to be read.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask that this resolution be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House insist upon its disagreement to Senate amendments 26, 27, 33, and 35 to House bill No. 10234 (the Army appropriation bill), and that the House request of the Senate a committee of conference on said bill; and it is hereby declared to be the judgment of this House that the managers on the part of the House should insist upon the disagreement to said amendments, and should not consent that appropriations for fortifications should be placed on the Army bill, as that subject has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and all matters relating thereto may be placed on the fortification bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What does the gentleman from Texas propose?

Mr. SAYERS. I propose to offer that resolution in lieu of the simple motion to non-concur.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution has only been read for information.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not believe that this resolution of the gentleman from Texas would be in order. If I understand the rules correctly, the custom has been—and it has been held as proper under the rules by those who have presided over the House—that there should be at least one free conference without instruction, and then, when the conferees have acted and made their report, it is in order to offer a resolution of instructions. That is the regular order of proceeding in reference to a conference report. I for one, however, am willing that the House may give an expression upon the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Texas. I do not think it ought to be adopted; I do not think it is in order; but for the purpose of reaching final action on this bill I am willing that the House may have an opportunity to vote upon the gentleman's amendment and adopt it, if the House is willing to so instruct.

Mr. CANNON. I may also want to offer an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My proposition is that the House simply non-concur. The gentleman from Texas proposes to instruct the conferees. I say that is not usual, and in my judgment is not in order; but to promote harmony, to economize time, and to secure early action on this bill, I am willing that a vote be taken on that proposition.

Mr. LAIRD. As I understood the resolution, it contained a clause concerning the reference of this subject-matter to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I did not so understand.

Mr. HOOKER. I raise the point of order that the proposition offered by the gentleman from Texas is not germane to the subject now before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the resolution was simply read for the information of the House.

Mr. HOOKER. If it be offered, I shall raise that point of order upon it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I make simply this motion—that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill, that the Senate amendments thereto be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that all debate upon the bill be closed at 4 o'clock, when the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the motion to non-concur and upon any amendments that may be in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill; that debate on the same in the House be closed at 4 o'clock, and that the previous question be then considered as ordered upon the motion to non-concur in the pending amendments and agree to a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. BAYNE. I object.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, if carried, would not necessarily preclude the House from considering the proposition of the gentleman from Texas?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would, unless there were an exception made allowing such an amendment or resolution to be offered.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope there will be no objection to allowing the House to vote on it.

Mr. HOOKER. I give notice that I shall make the point of order upon the proposition of the gentleman from Texas that it is not germane to the motion before the House, and ought not to be considered.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois unless we can agree upon the modification suggested by the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is objection by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I then submit the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill, and that all debate——

A MEMBER. All general debate?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That all debate upon the bill and Senate amendments be closed in one hour.

Mr. BAYNE. I make the point of order against that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAYNE. Why, that the motion is not in order that the House shall go into Committee of the Whole, and that all debate be limited without considering propositions under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that except by unanimous consent there could be no order of the House limiting debate upon any paragraph that has not been reached.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I modify the motion according to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HOOKER. There are but two amendments of the Senate, as I understand it, not yet acted upon.

Mr. SAYERS. There are more than that.

Mr. HOOKER. Well, three or four; one is in reference to the Watervliet arsenal and the other for the purchase of steel for heavy armament.

Mr. SAYERS. There are two others.

Mr. HOOKER. Well, say four amendments in all. Now, the gentleman wants debate under the five-minute rule. We are not considering a bill at all, but certain amendments.

Mr. BAYNE. I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

Mr. HOOKER. I am speaking to the point of order as to whether you can offer an amendment. There are four amendments, as I understand it, of the Senate to be acted upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HOOKER. And the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to limit debate and consider the previous question ordered at 4 o'clock is in order, because there is no bill to consider here, but only certain amendments which have already been read in Committee of the Whole, and on which debate has been had for some time.

Mr. BAYNE. I propose to move an amendment to one of the amendments pending from the Senate. I propose to ask that these amendments be read, and shall ask concurrence in one of them with an amendment. No motion that can now be made can exclude me from that right, and the right to debate it; and until this proposition of the Senate shall have been read, and the debate upon each one of the paragraphs has taken place under the five-minute rule, no motion that can be made now to close debate can be in order. I shall object to anything that will interfere with my right in that matter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understood in Committee of the Whole the amendment to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania referred had been read.

Mr. BAYNE. My amendment was not. I have not yet offered it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I refer now to the pending Senate amendments. I ask this question: Is it not in order for me to move that all debate be closed upon the amendments, there being two only remaining, both of which have been read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The closing of debate upon any general appropriation bill, or any bill considered in Committee of the Whole by paragraphs, is not competent, except that the House may close debate upon any single paragraph of or amendment to the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Both of these amendments have been under debate since yesterday afternoon.

Mr. BLOUNT. Under general debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that under the rules of the House the amendments of the Senate must be considered by sections.

Mr. BLOUNT. Just as the original bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is the logical way.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is right.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to further consider the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill, and pending that motion that all general debate be closed in one hour; upon which I ask the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to that motion.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to do that. It will facilitate matters to adopt another course.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. BAYNE. Well, I want some time on this myself. Say that you close the debate at half past 4 o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Very well; I am willing to modify it to the extent that general debate be closed at 4 o'clock, and on that I call the previous question.

Mr. SPINOLA. Before that I wish to ask a question for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPINOLA. I understood, sir, on yesterday that the questions under consideration were these Senate amendments, commencing with No. 33, and that section 2 had not been concurred in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. They have not been.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to ask the gentleman if he proposes that the time shall be equally divided?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That has already been settled.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman did not so specify in his motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will repeat it, and put it in writing if it be necessary to satisfy the gentleman.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the motion to close all general debate at 4 o'clock was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole the Chair will, with the consent of the House, submit some personal requests.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MATSON, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BACON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate on the Senate amendments to this bill will be closed at 4 o'clock, the time to be equally divided.

The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio to control the time in opposition and the gentleman from Illinois to control the time in favor of the amendments.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I think it is to be regretted this debate has taken so wide a range. It really related to parliamentary procedure, as to what this House ought to do to maintain its own dignity and sense of self-respect in the matter of conducting its business. My friend from Maine lays down a proposition, the soundness of which nobody disputes, and then assaults it with characteristic energy, and of course is successful in establishing that he is right.

Nobody in this House has disputed the right of the Senate to prescribe rules for its own proceedings. Nobody has questioned that this House enjoys the same right. Nobody questions that the Senate has the power to attach whatever amendments it sees fit to any bill that goes before that body.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that a parliamentary error has been made by the Chair in yielding the control of the time in opposition to the Senate amendments to the military bill to the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman from Texas has been recognized to control that time.

Mr. SAYERS (to Mr. BUTTERWORTH). I yield whatever time you desire to complete your remarks.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Clearly the Senate has the right, in the sense that the word "right" is used as signifying power and authority. It is not the existence of that power and authority I call in question. I use the word "right" in a different sense, which is expressive of fitness, propriety, justice, taking into consideration the obligations that rest upon the Senate to observe that comity which should deter that body from taking any action in disregard of the rules of this House, which are ordained to secure proper and orderly methods in matters of legislation.

And it will not be denied that it has been the custom of this House and of the Senate to compel an observation of the methods prescribed by those rules. I am not mistaken in saying that the Senate absolutely refused to consider amendments attached to an appropriation bill by the House because the rules of the Senate forbade such amendments to an appropriation bill.

And, sir, it is known to all of us that, in deference to the Senate, we changed the rules of this body in order that the reasonable requirements of the rules of the Senate might not be disregarded. We abdicated our right to legislate on appropriation bills.

In other words, we did not attempt to compel the Senate to violate its own rules in the conduct of its business. And now the question presented is, will the Senate compel this House or ask this House to trample its rules under foot And will we do it, or will we maintain our own dignity by a proper adherence to the rules, in the observance of which alone can we hope to avoid being treated by the Senate as if this were a town meeting and not a deliberative legislative body of equal dignity with the Senate. Now, I am not insisting or suggesting that the Senate desires to disregard the rights of this body. There may have been an apprehension, possibly, as has been suggested here, that a fortification bill would not be reported, and deeming it proper, if not objected to by the House, they attached to the military bill the amendments in question which cover matter which belong to the fortification bill. But the reason for doing that did not in fact exist, and it is this palpable violation of the rules of this House and the violation of the comity which must obtain between the two Houses that I resist.

I am surprised to hear my friend from Illinois say that under the wording of the rule which determines and limits the jurisdiction of the several committees of this House, it is perfectly competent for the Military Committee to take jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the Senate amendment. The claim is utterly untenable. If he will read the rules and construe them as a whole he will find the jurisdiction of the several committees is plainly marked out, and this House will not question that the jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the amendments now under consideration belongs to the Committee on Appropriations and the subcommittee having charge of fortifications. They will not question that. The language is too clear and the line of precedent too well established to permit of any doubt.

Now, was there such an exigency as to authorize the Senate, in defiance of its own rules and in utter disregard of the rights of this House, to attach to the military bill that which had no proper place there? That they did it is sure. Are they justified in it?

What is the object of having rules? If they may disregard the rules of this House in the matter of amending bills, they may attach to any single appropriation bill—the agricultural bill, for instance—amendments making all the appropriations authorized by law to carry on the Government, and thus, by refusing to observe the reasonable rules which we have ordained for the proper conduct of the business of this House, usurp the rightful constitutional jurisdiction of this body to "originate money bills." It is absolutely necessary in making appropriations to carry on the different branches of the Government that rules be prescribed governing the preparation of bills, having reference to the subject-matter and the convenience of the House in the conduct of its business. Under the authority of the Constitution we have made such rules, and among other things they provide for the preparation of appropriation bills, fixing and limiting the jurisdiction of each committee and designating the subject-matter which may be embraced in each bill.

The jurisdiction of the Military Committee is clearly pointed out; and if all the items which may be included in either bill are not named in the rule there are items which confessedly belong exclusively to the fortification bill, and those very items have been by the Senate included in amendments made to the military bill while it was under consideration in that body. There was the same fitness and propriety in adding amendments making appropriations for the Navy and the Indian Department, and for pensions, etc.

The fact that we can not control the action of the Senate has nothing to do with the case. The fact remains that we can control our own action and observe our own rules, one of which in express terms forbids the Military Committee from assuming jurisdiction of fortifications, and the Senate can not by virtue of an amendment to an appropriation bill confer upon the Committee on Military Affairs of this House a jurisdiction which the rules of the House in express terms deny to that committee. Clearly if it were otherwise the jurisdiction of the several committees of this body would depend upon the pleasure of the Senate rather than upon the rules of this House.

The result would be that the Committee on Invalid Pensions might, by the action of the Senate, be clothed with full and ample jurisdiction to make appropriations for the Navy, the Army, consular and diplomatic service, and so on. And thus two things would result. First, the Senate would, by way of amendments to a pension appropriation bill, originate every other "money bill" in the catalogue of appropriation bills; and, secondly, nullify the most important rules of this House.

In assigning to different committees of this body the duty of preparing certain appropriation bills, we do not thereby abdicate our constitutional right to originate others covering other subjects. It is the right of the Senate to amend bills, but not to enlarge or extend the jurisdiction of that body or abridge the jurisdiction of this.

I have said thus much in defense of the rightful authority of this body and in advocacy of our dignity and independence as a co-ordinate branch of Congress. One other matter. My friend from Maine [Mr. REED] assumes that the Committee on Fortifications, or the subcommittee, are opposed to the building of guns and the establishment of a Government plant. That is an assumption. He ought to know better than that, if he has examined the subject at all.

Mr. REED. It is an assumption that is borne out by history.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is an assumption that is borne out by a certain kind of history, which discloses only a part of the truth. The full history is that unless all possible competition in the production of guns was shut out, unless every individual, every firm, every manufacturer was shut out and a very few individuals permitted to exercise unquestioned control in the production of armament and guns, no appropriation was wanted.

Mr. REED. Captain Smith says that your million and a half appropriation will shut them out—i. e., shut out competition.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is not that particular competition that is the production of steel to which I call attention.

Mr. REED. I know it is not.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman mentioned by my friend

[Mr. REED], Captain Smith, of the Ordnance Bureau, testified that we make ample provision for the Ordnance Bureau in the fortification bill. In the first place, we give $750,000 to establish and complete a plant at Watervliet arsenal. It was the full amount asked. Not a penny was abated from the estimate. The sum named will provide machines and tools for assembling and completing heavy guns. We go beyond that, and while the Senate amendment to the Army bill provides only for 8 and 10-inch guns, we provide for 10, 12, 14, and 16 inch guns, which are absolutely necessary, Captain Smith says, for proper coast defense. We have provided for the purchase of steel, limiting the price; we have made an appropriation to purchase all the steel they want, all they can use for five years in building steel guns or built-up steel guns, which Captains Smith and Birnie believe to be the best type of gun invented up to this time.

To purchase this steel we give the full estimate, $1,500,000, required to procure steel sufficient to keep the bureau up for at least five years. So the Ordnance Bureau is not abridged in any respect, as some gentlemen would have this House believe. Now, my friend said yesterday something which was very significant in this connection, namely, that in the manufacture of steel the product at first was limited—I do not remember the number of tons that he named, perhaps 16 tons per day—but he said that within a few years the product was doubled and thribled owing to improved methods, etc.

Mr. REED. I never said that.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, it is the fact nevertheless, and I so understood you.

Mr. REED. Nor anything like it. I was not talking on that subject. But I know how the gentleman has been led into that mistake.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, possibly the gentleman was not talking about the precise matter I have in my mind, but nevertheless it is the fact that with improved methods and increased facilities the quantity and quality has been increased and improved.

Mr. REED. I was talking about trained workmen.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, that is an element in producing better results both in matter of quantity and quality of output. So it will be seen that we have made ample appropriations to keep the Ordnance Department of the Army busy for five or six years. This is not and can not be disputed. Nor can it be doubted that we have provided them all the funds they require for plant and material. Now, what else can they ask, and what is there in addition that can in good conscience be demanded?

It is known to every gentleman upon this floor that the art of manufacturing steel and steel guns is growing and developing as rapidly as any other art, and the chances are that in the future as in the past, possibly next year or the year after, we may be able to get the steel at very greatly reduced cost, and steel guns of better quality and on better terms than we could get to-day. Then, since we provide for purchasing a sufficient quantity of steel to last the Ordnance Bureau, working at its topmost bent, for five or six years, what on earth is the present necessity for buying three or four times that quantity, as proposed in the Senate amendment, and which my friend from Maine advocates by the testimony of the officers referred to? One million five hundred thousand dollars' worth of steel is ample for all purposes for five years at least, and yet because we object to buying three or four times as much it is urged that we are opposed to building guns, having provided for the purchase of all we can possibly need within five years.

We are assailed for objecting to the purchase of what we confessedly do not need and could not use within the time mentioned. Whether the interests of the steel manufacturer or the Government would be subserved by the immediate purchase of vast quantities of steel which by all the evidence will not be needed within five or six years, this House and the country can determine. But my friend says that if we limit the purchase to fifteen hundred thousand dollars the competition may be restricted or cut off. No danger of that. The danger of loss is far greater in purchasing at present large quantities of steel from six to ten years before it is needed for any purpose whatever. And just here it is interesting to note the jealous care with which competition in the purchase of steel is guarded, while all competition in the manufacture of guns is completely shut out and prohibited. Why, sir, one of the loudest complaints in regard to the pending fortification bill reported to this House is that it provides for competition in the matter of guns. We have provided that when any individual, firm, or manufacturing company shall produce and bring to the Government a better gun than that which we have the Government will take that gun if the terms are reasonable. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] knows very well that men do not fabricate guns as mere experiments, nor can they go to the expense incident to the production of heavy guns unless there is a chance of selling to the Government in case the gun produced stands the prescribed test and meets every requirement of the service.

Private enterprise can not afford to. The expense of these experiments must, in the end, rest upon the Government, always provided the experiments are of such a character as to promise good and satisfactory results; and if my friend from Iowa says to the Department, "I will, at my own expense, cost, and risk, produce a 14-inch steel gun and guaranty that it shall be the best in use, and if it is not better than the guns you now have, or the equal of any gun, I do not ask you to purchase it or pay for the testing; I will stand the loss; but if I do fabricate such a gun, if I do make the best gun yet tendered to the public, then I ask you to pay for it and give me an order for the manufacture of such number of guns as will prove fairly remunerative to me," is not that reasonable?

Is that anything but plain, practical business sense? If it is not I do not know what is. Now, my friend says that the Ordnance Board alone should pass upon that gun, and that it is their exclusive right and their duty to sit in judgment to determine between that gun and one of their own invention and construction, and that their test and their judgment shall be final, being subject to no review and from which there shall be no appeal. With that proposition I have no sympathy whatever. My friend says the Ordnance Department can not be a competitor with any individual. He is in error there. They admit that they are now in competition with the Navy Department.

Mr. REED. That is a different kind of gun.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh. I understand that the competition is to produce the best gun and vindicate the wisdom and experience and knowledge of the officer of the corps. That there is competition can not be denied. It is a worthy ambition; but I say to the gentleman, and he will agree with me in his heart whether he does with his lips or not, that in addition to prescribing test of the quality, power, range, and endurance of the guns, eminent engineers and officers should stand by to determine which is the better arm. To say that there are no men outside of the Ordnance Bureau competent to sit with the officers of that bureau to decide upon the excellence of a gun is absurd. We all know better.

I agree with my friend that often these commissions or boards have in a degree proved a failure. But that does not even tend to prove that a board would not be useful in this case. You [addressing Mr. REED] were on a commission to make certain investigations.

Mr. REED. A totally different affair.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand it is; but you were upon such a commission. No matter about the affair.

Mr. REED. Why are you comparing them, if you understand they are totally different?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Because there is an analogy between them.

Mr. REED. Oh, an analogy!

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You were equal to the emergency, were you not?

Mr. REED. I usually am——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I know you usually are; and taking your own judgment you always are; but I want to call attention——

Mr. REED. I want to be equal to the present emergency, if I can.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman, nobody questions, labored industriously and intelligently to reach a proper result. Now, there are in this country mechanical engineers, metallurgists, and others familiar with the fabrication of arms, who are competent, standing by the side of these officers, to judge whether the gun produced to be tested fully meets all the requirements of that test in the matter of accuracy of fire, range, and power of endurance, and whether it excels others with which it competes. Now, is it not fair, if the Government is asked to buy ordnance manufactured by a private establishment in preference to that manufactured by the Ordnance Corps, that we should have impartial judges to determine the relative merits of the competing arms?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would like to ask how the Navy Department is getting along building guns now?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, they are not getting along rapidly. Government work never does.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Are they getting along?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, they are getting along slowly.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Satisfactorily to the Navy Department or to the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, I will not say how satisfactorily the work may be going on to the Navy Department or the country. That is not of consequence. We are not interfering with the Army or the Navy; we are not abridging the powers, the duties, or the opportunities of the Ordnance Bureau. Not a word to that effect is correct. We are giving them all the machinery and plant they ask; and they name the amount required. We are giving them all the money they ask, and they fix the amount themselves. We are giving them all the assistance they ask, and they determine what it shall be. We are permitting them to make the guns they say are best, and they select them themselves. We are allowing them to adopt the type of gun which they prefer, which they in part invented. In all things, you see, they are given carte blanche.

Now, here are sixty millions of people; and I think we are not immodest in saying that they are as full of productive and inventive genius as any people on the earth. All we ask or have sought to do, after providing amply for the Ordnance Department, is that individual citizens, firms, or manufacturing establishments shall not be absolutely shut out from competing for supplying the Government with that which it confessedly needs in the line not only of steel forgings but steel guns and other kinds of guns; that they shall be permitted to enter the lists and supply the guns if they will supply a better article than can be obtained elsewhere or produced by the Ordnance Corps. When they bring to the Government a gun and say, "Here is a gun which for endurance, accuracy of fire, and range is superior to any other;" if that can be established, why should not the gun be accepted and that private enterprise encouraged?

Mr. REED. That gun is in their minds now, is it not?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, there is some difference of opinion whether it is or not. All we ask is that if it materializes into a better gun than any competitor it shall stand a fair chance in the field of competition.

Mr. REED. It is not in existence.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If we pursue your course, it is liable to remain in their minds, since encouragement in producing it is denied. All inventions originate in the mind.

Mr. LAIRD. If we leave it to the Committee on Appropriations it always will be there.

Mr. REED. Yes; that is the truth about it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is not the truth about it, and the reading of the bill we have reported shows how far from correct your statement is.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It looks like it when they do not bring in their bill until the 1st of August.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The time of reporting the bill has nothing to do with the character of its provisions.

My friend knows that the gentleman [Mr. RANDALL] who was on the subcommittee to prepare this bill was sick nigh unto death; and we delayed its consideration in the hope that he would soon join us. This delay is the excuse for this interference or trespassing upon the jurisdiction of another committee by reason of the apprehension that his sickness might delay action beyond what was proper. That is the excuse you gentlemen might offer. I do not know that any excuse is in fact offered.

Mr. CUTCHEON. How long did that sickness continue?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio, when did the country hear a report on this very question in the Forty-ninth Congress?

Mr. REED. On the last day.

Mr. FARQUHAR. In the last hours of the last day of that Congress.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And I know better than the gentleman does just what caused the delay.

Mr. HOOKER and others. Let us have the reason.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The reason is not exactly in the direction you have suggested. I am as patriotic as you are. I have as just appreciation of what is due to the dignity of this House as you have. I realize as fully as you can the importance of defending the coast of my country. I agree with you as to the necessity for appropriations, and we go along step by step in doing everything, until the committee propose to draw against the resources of this whole country by opening the door to competition. Then you gentlemen draw the line, and say "No." It is not sufficient that we have provided all that is needed, all that is asked for, everything in the shape of plant, everything needful in the shape of money and material, all in accordance with the estimates.

The only cause of complaint is that we have not provided what is confessedly not needed, and have provided competition which beyond question is needed.

There are three officers of the United States Government who think, or our friends think, can provide for all our wants better than all our people combined, and that we shall rely on these three officers, and on them alone. We do not differ, gentlemen, about anything except as to the matter of utilizing the individual enterprise, the capital, and patriotism, and genius of this country. You and I agree as to the importance——

Mr. CUTCHEON. And we do not differ about the other.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You and I agree as to the importance of having this work done. We do not differ, then, except as to that single proposition, and as to the quantity of steel which we provide for purchasing. We make provision for the erection of a plant at Watervliet, supposed to be the best place, all things considered. We acted upon advice, selected that point, which, as I understood, is recommended by experts, civilians, and soldiers as well.

We provided for furnishing all the steel ingots that they may require. We provided for furnishing everything else that they may need in the next five or six years, but, unfortunately, we went beyond and it is supposed incurred the displeasure of three of the officers of the Government; or, what is more likely, their champions elsewhere in that we have attempted to draw against the accumulated stock of genius, wisdom, and experience of sixty millions of people in this matter——

Mr. CUTCHEON. You refer to the thirteen million test appropriation?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, I do not refer to any tests at all. I am dealing with a proposition embodied in a clause in a bill, which provides simply for competition in the matter of producing guns, just as we have competition in the production of everything else needed for and used by the Government. Now, Captain Smith says that is fair and is right, and beyond that——

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman now yield for one or two questions?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I can not yield; I have but little more time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I want to get at some points in this connection. First of all, you ask the competitors in this country to produce for you a perfect gun——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, no. We do not expect to get that. We will hardly attain to perfection in this world.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Now, there is not a single recommendation for the last five years in these debates but that that proposition has been brought forward and overturned. I look to this bill now simply as a business proposition. When you put $800,000 into a plant, buy steel ingots, and leave it to one or two men, a commission possibly, to pass upon the tensility and powers of the steel, and it is thrown out, where is the remedy——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, well, I can not yield now to the gentleman to make a speech. My friend will perceive that he is ambling off into quite an argument. Nobody proposes to interfere in the direction he suggests, as I take it. He greatly misapprehends the provisions of the bill he is criticising.

Mr. FARQUHAR. But yet, as I understand you, you want them to produce a perfect gun.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. There is no use in talking about a perfect gun. We are talking about the best gun that can be produced as well as the best steel that we can produce in this country, and that in supplying both there shall be fair competition. Now, first we fit up a plant to do the work, and provide the necessary amount of money, and then say to the Ordnance Bureau "In order to permit you to proceed with the manufacturing guns, we will give you all the money and material necessary;" but we also say to private competitors engaged in the same kind of business in this country, "If you can give us a better gun, why, let as have it, and we will purchase from you."

Mr. FARQUHAR. What government does that?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Every government on the face of the earth that is not office-ridden does it. Germany does it, France does it, Italy does it, England does it, and so do all nations except our own.

Mr. REED. Does either one of these governments overslaw its own officers and say that they are not to exercise any judgment in reference to the matter? Your bill proceeds upon the false theory that the Ordnance Corps is building guns in competition with certain outside parties. They are not engaged in any such thing, but in building guns which have already been decided upon, and the nature of which, as I said last night, is just as thoroughly well understood as any ordinary piece of mechanism that is constructed by man.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman entirely misapprehends the provisos of our bill. It neither does, nor squints in the direction he suggests. The officers mentioned are very far from being overslawed. We only seek to see to it that the private enterprise and individual right and opportunity shall not be overslawed by a few individuals, whether officers or civilians. Neither the opportunity nor the jurisdiction of the officers is abridged, but the just, right, and proper privileges of the citizens of the country are somewhat released from distressing and hampering restrictions. An examination of the bill we report will satisfy the gentleman that his criticisms are ill-conceived and unjust.

Now, it is not intended to introduce the production of guns into the field of competition, except to say to our manufacturers and to the people generally, "If you will meet every requirement of the service in the production of guns, if you can furnish to us the character of arm that is ascertained by test to be the best, then we say in determining between the gun so produced and that which the Government manufactures at its own arsenal, at least a part of the board that sits in judgment should not be of those competing." That is the difference between the gentleman from Maine and myself. He would make the competing officers (true, he says they are not competing officers) the sole and final judges between themselves and the private manufacturer.

We claim that our manufacturers and artisans have as much skill and ability and genius as our officers, notwithstanding the fact that we hold the latter in high estimation. When we enter upon the purchase of guns we insist that the judgment of the officers intrusted with that duty shall be exercised to enable them to utilize every gun produced by the genius and skill of this country, until by their tests and experiments they have succeeded in getting that which is of all the best. But the gentleman seeks to create the impression that because we seek to utilize every proper available resource we are unfriendly to the manufacture of guns. My friend is unjust in that, and unjust to me when in the midst of a sentence he ambles in to make some observations. When he desired me to yield to him he could have asked.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield for a single moment?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend knows the time was equally divided between the sides, and his colleague will yield him such time as he desires. If his friends had no time at their disposal I would willingly yield.

I only want to make one statement, and then I will yield the floor. I am appealing to this House to maintain its own dignity, as the Senate maintains its dignity. We do not want to violate the rules of our own body by permitting amendments in palpable violation of the rules of the Senate and against the rules of the House. This I am not willing to acquiesce in. There is a bill pending here that meets all the requirements of the situation; a bill that is in order, and conforms to the rules of both the Senate and House. The amendments sent to us from the Senate conform to neither, but are an inexcusable violation of both. The bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations does all that is demanded by the necessities, and in the matter of supplying our needs draws on the resources of the whole country. It provides that we shall pay for nothing that does not meet every proper requirement; to pay for nothing that does not stand the test of wise and prudent experiment and just judgment; to pay for nothing that does not meet the exigency that calls for its production; and yet it is endeavored to make it appear that I am unfriendly to the fabrication of guns and to providing for the public defense.

I agree that there is only one chance in a hundred for war, and I agree also that the best peace-preserver is to have such guns along our coast that no man-of-war dares to approach within range of our cities. [Applause.]

But there is a way of reaching that result by pursuing orderly methods—the usual and well-considered methods we have prescribed, and which the Senate have prescribed, and which we are willing to accept, as far as they are concerned, and they must regard so far as the maintenance of the prerogatives and dignity of this body demand. We are nearer the people than they are. This is the only representative body in our Federal system. We can hear the heart-throbs of the people; they can not. We recognize that we may grow and develop the art of war as well as the arts that pertain to peace, and we propose to give full scope to that development and so achieve in that field greater and grander results than any other nation or people.

I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] yield to me for awhile?

Mr. RYAN. I have not control of the time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to make the suggestion that the debate shall be alternated from side to side, and I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] so that he may, if he desires, yield the time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], in order that he may reply as he desires to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have five minutes, which I now yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. I desired the floor to confront the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] who has made as thorough a misstatement, unintentionally undoubtedly on his part, of this situation as could possibly be made. I may be the reverse of an "angel" again in doing it, but I shall persevere. He has used the word competition in two different senses in the same comparison, which would amount to saying to this House that the board of ordnance is a manufacturing corporation in competition with others; and he asks if there should not be allowed a third board, composed of outsiders who might decide between them and the manufacturers with whom they are in competition.

Now, I say that it is the fundamental error of this whole discussion, and upon it is founded everything which the gentleman from Ohio has said, excepting alone that which he has been kind enough to say of me. Now, I say to you that under the laws of the United States the ordnance board are themselves constituted the judges, and they have decided that a certain gun is the best gun that can be built as far as modern science now shows, and in this decision they are backed up by the whole civilized world.

Now, long ago a certain set of men who have been unable to convince this board that their guns, which exist only in their own minds up to date, will be better guns than those which the civilized world in its judgment has approved and which alone we have got to meet in battle, began to ask that a new board shall be appointed to try the issue between them and the judges constituted by law; and they did it for the purpose of throwing opprobrium upon those who have carefully listened to their plans and found that they did not convince their judgments. How totally different is this from the picture presented by the gentleman from Ohio, to be a board constituted to decide between them and another set of manufacturers.

You are undertaking to reverse the decisions of your own constituted judges. What have we here as sensible men to do. The fictitious question is about appealing from the officers whom we have trained up at the public expense to decide upon this question, who have declared in favor of the gun of which the whole world is in favor; the very gun we have to meet; and the real question is, shall we build that gun. The gentlemen say we will build a few, and we will establish a board for the very purpose of breaking the decision of our constituted judges in order to build other guns which may or may not prove to be satisfactory. Let us rise to the height of the real information and the real facts which surround this question.

This is not a question of producing a lot of wood-screws; it is not a question of producing coils of hoop-iron. It is a question of producing an engine which it takes five years to build, and we have already wasted more than five years in this kind of conflict, in this effort on the part of some members of the Committee on Appropriations to accomplish one of two objects, either to overthrow the Board of Ordnance or not to build any guns at all. I accord to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] perfect sincerity.

I think he is governed by his great idea that some general notion of patriotism and invention is going to do better than invention has already done. That is always a possibility, and the gentleman is seduced by that idea into opposition to the only practical proposition that has been before the House for years. There is another class into whose hands the gentleman unintentionally plays, and that class is a set of men who believe that no guns whatever ought to be built, that we are strong enough to defend ourselves in all possible emergencies; but I believe I demonstrated yesterday that this country is not and can not be in that position, and that no country can be in that position which is liable to be attacked by arms the like of which can not be fabricated in less than five years. What, then, is our duty at the present moment, single and simple?

It is to go to work to build guns which will meet the guns that are to come against us. If we do that it is all that we can hope to do for the present. So far as the future is concerned, let us meet that when it comes; but our trouble now is that we are not abreast of the present, and what I demand is that this House shall take practical action to bring us up abreast of the present, and not let us lose ourselves in those clouds of patriotism, of capital, of "sixty millions of people," all those glittering generalities which never yet built a cannon. [Applause.]

We have got a very plain course before us, and that is the common-sense course, to get up with the present, to be abreast of the times. And what is opposed to it? Why, some hopes as to the possible achievements of inventors in the future. What else is opposed to it? The dignity of the House, which can not endure that the Senate of the United States, an independent body, shall amend our bills unless they do it in accordance with our rules! Why, to sensible men these two objections to the sensible amendments of the Senate are really too absurd for discussion, and if personal feeling and committee feeling had not mingled with this matter I do not believe there would be the slightest hesitancy on the part of the House in concurring with the amendments of the Senate. [Applause.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Neither do I.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the ridicule of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] of the position which the House has assumed of protecting its own dignity, there are some observations that I desire to submit to the House in that direction. When the effort was made in the Forty-ninth Congress to take from the Appropriations Committee several appropriation bills and distribute them to other committees of the House I was found among the earnest advocates of that change. Subsequently, when, as I believed, the Committee on Appropriations had usurped powers which did not belong to them by putting amendments upon a bill in violation of the rules, I assaulted the Committee on Appropriations on that proposition.

Still later, when controversy arose between that committee and another committee of the House with reference to a particular appropriation, I still upheld the integrity of the committee to whom that subject had been intrusted as against the claims of the Appropriations Committee. And now I stand here to-day to preserve the integrity of the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee against what I conceive to be an usurpation upon the part of another committee of this House, namely, the Committee on Military Affairs. In view of the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] has quoted the ruling of the Speaker of this House, as well as the rulings of one of the chairmen of the committee [Mr. SPRINGER], himself a good parliamentarian, upon this precise point now presented, and has supplemented that by quoting the specific report of the Committee on Rules, it is perhaps a waste of time for me to say that the jurisdiction of this question clearly belongs to the Committee on Appropriations.

But I invite attention to one single feature of the rule which of itself demonstrates that either the Military Committee have no jurisdiction over the "military establishment" or that it has no jurisdiction over the "public defense," one or the other; the Military Committee can take either horn of the dilemma. In the original rules of the Forty-eighth Congress this provision reads as follows:

Subjects relating to the military establishment and the public defense, other than appropriations for its support.

And in the first part of the provision, containing the words "to the military establishment and the public defense," there was no comma or punctuation whatever.

But in the new rule, unlike any other provision in the rules, the language remains the same, but the punctuation is changed as follows:

Subjects relating to the military establishment—

Then comes a comma—
and the public defense—
Then comes a comma—including the appropriation for—
For what?
for its support.

Not for their support, but for its support. What does "it" refer to? Does "it" refer to "the public defense?" If it does, you have no jurisdiction over "the military establishment." Does "it" refer to "the military establishment?" If it does, you have no jurisdiction over "the public defense." You may take either horn of the dilemma you please.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We take both.

Mr. ROGERS. That usurpation of "taking both" is what I protest against, and in the interest of the integrity of our proceedings.

Having said that much, I now come to another question. In the Thirty-fourth Congress there was a delay for nearly two months in the organization of this House. The Senate after its organization, in its anxiety to expedite business, originated, passed, and sent to this House two appropriation bills.

What did this House do with them? In accordance with that provision of the Federal Constitution which provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills," the House laid those bills on the table and refused to consider them at all.

I now read what General Atkins, of Tennessee, then said on that subject, and my excellent and capable friend, the clerk of the Appropriations Committee, tells me he has verified these statements and that they are true:

The Constitution having invested this House with the power of originating all revenue or money bills, as a necessary and logical deduction it has ever been the uniform practice of the Senate to concede to the House the right to originate the general appropriation bills with one or two exceptions, in which cases the House as promptly denied the power of the Senate, and asserted its exclusive right to originate them. As in the Thirty-fourth Congress, the House failing for over two months to organize, the Senate passed two of the general appropriation bills and sent them down to the House, whereupon the House at once laid them upon the table, refusing either to consider them or refer them to a committee. This power was again conceded by the Senate in the case of the tariff-compromise bill of Mr. Clay, in 1833.

The great lights of the Senate in that day took the ground that the bill trenched upon the prerogatives of the House, and was therefore unconstitutional. Mr. Webster was prominent in declaring it unconstitutional, and Mr. Clay himself conceded it virtually by taking up an exactly similar bill that had passed the House and had it substituted for his own, laying his upon the table.

Now, let us look at this question in another view. Here in our rules is a provision giving jurisdiction over fortifications to the Committee on Appropriations; here in our rules is another provision giving jurisdiction over the military establishment and appropriations for its support to the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Military Affairs reports the Army appropriation bill, over which subject-matter it has jurisdiction, the House passes it, and it is sent to the Senate. The Senate substantially, though indirectly, places upon the bill a separate, independent appropriation bill, embracing a subject over which the Committee on Military Affairs has no jurisdiction whatever, to wit, fortifications.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is a matter of opinion, whether it has or not.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me go on in my own time. That is the attitude in which we are placed. Yet we are told that we, the representatives of the people, those who come fresh from the people every two years, are to surrender the power and authority conferred upon us by the Constitution, the power to originate these measures, and, moreover, that other provision of the Constitution which gives the House of Representatives the right to establish its own rules of procedure, is to be subverted, nullified, and the orderly and decent disposition of the public business in the House of Representatives set at defiance.

Mr. Chairman, that is what I protest against. And, sir, when either by inadvertence or error a committee of this House has sent to it a bill over which it has no jurisdiction, and when that bill comes back, seeks to have it considered, I insist that the House should do with such committee as it did with the Appropriations Committee in the Forty-ninth Congress, rebuke it for its usurpation of power, in order that we may preserve our system and methods of disposing of the public business.

Mr. CUTCHEON. To what does the gentleman refer?

Mr. ROGERS. I allude to the bill in the Forty-ninth Congress of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] had control.

Mr. HOOKER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir; not at this time.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman without his consent.

Mr. ROGERS. Very well; I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOOKER. Why did not the House "rebuke" the Committee on Military Affairs when they reported the bill, and when it was passed in the House?

Mr. ROGERS. That is about as irrelevant a question as I supposed it would be. We know that these things are done inadvertently; erroneous references are constantly made; corrections of such errors are made every day. Members do not hear everything that takes place in the House. No answer is needed to a question like that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us stop and look at the consequences of this method of procedure. On yesterday, if you will refer to the public records, you will find that in the Senate of the United States (if I may be permitted to allude to those proceedings) an attempt was made to place on the sundry civil appropriation bill appropriations for public buildings; not only that, but also an amendment in regard to refunding the direct tax. And it was said then and there that if provision was put on the bill for one public building, provisions for every one of the public buildings should be put on that sundry civil bill, amounting to nine millions, I believe. Thus there would be taken away from this House and from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that jurisdiction which properly belongs to them in the orderly, decent, respectful method of disposing of public business. Moreover, that bill would place the President in the position of being coerced to sign it with all these public-building appropriations in it, or else veto it and cripple the Government. Would we submit to such an unusual, unjustifiable proceeding?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is it not customary in this House to put provisions for public buildings on the sundry civil bill?

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman will please excuse me. His remark is entirely irrelevant to the issue I am making.

I say that the proposition now presented is an initial point in a policy which looks to subverting and destroying the responsibility of the separate committees of this House for the legislation intrusted to their care. It is against this I protest.

Mr. Chairman, if the Senate of the United States in its judgment sees fit to refuse to observe that unwritten law of courtesy and comity between the two Houses which looks to the orderly, decent, and respectful consideration of the public business, I conceive it my duty to enter my protest, and if necessary to sit here until the 4th day of next March protesting in every proper way consistent with parliamentary law against such a proceeding. And I never will, Mr. Chairman, willingly, knowingly surrender the power conferred upon this House by the Constitution and which is properly exercised by the representatives of the people—never. [Applause.] We may just as well make the stand here as later on when they seek to go further.

It is due to the Senate of the United States to say that when the attitude in which it was sought to place the House and the President was brought to its attention it voted down by a yea-and-nay vote the proposition to place public buildings on the sundry civil bill out of the usual and regular method of proceeding with regard to them. So they conceded by their own practice, by their own votes, by the unwritten law between the two Houses, that that was improper and could not be justified. Not only did they do that, but most distinctly did the ablest gentlemen on both sides of the Senate Chamber condemn it openly and above board as improper and unwarranted. Shall we in the House do less? Have we less respect for ourselves than they concede to us? If so, Mr. Chairman, we are unworthy to represent our constituency and to be intrusted with the powers vested in us by the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD].

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, allow me to call the attention of the committee to certain general considerations germane to the merits of this matter. The Committee on Military Affairs now and heretofore have tried to give the country some means of defense, and in attempting to do this they have heretofore, as now, met with the opposition of the Committee on Appropriations. We are trying to defend the coast and harbors of the country in a manner demanded by the safety and honor of the nation, and the only opposition we have ever met with during my service in Congress is the opposition of the Committee on Appropriations. That committee prefer their own dominion to the safety and defense of the country.

We are here to-day seeking to do for the coast and harbor defense of this country exactly what the Committee on Naval Affairs has been permitted to do for the defense of the country's property and honor on the seas.

Under the present rules the Committee on Appropriations claims the exclusive jurisdiction over all matters pertaining to the public defense. Conceding this claim, sir, as justified by the rules as construed in the Forty-ninth Congress, what of it? The country is interested not in their possession but their use of power.

The present rule under which they claim and exercise this power was adopted by and has been in force since the Forty-sixth Congress; for ten years this committee has had this power and refused to use it, except to defeat action, and now the only use to which they propose to put it is to defeat affirmative action which they for ten years have failed, refused, or neglected to take. If this statement of the attitude of this committee toward this legislation is not correct, will not some gentleman of that body tell me why it is that they never formulated a bill for the purpose of the common defense until the Army appropriation bill as amended by the Senate was returned to the House?

The failure of this committee to act in the past explains their attitude of obstruction to the only possible action that can be taken now, and compels thoughtful men to believe that their activity to-day is born rather of a determination to dominate our councils than to originate or permit legislation.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to thrash over the dry straw of a profitless discussion about conflicts of jurisdiction between this and the other House of Congress, a discussion in which the opponents of legislation seek to supplement an unreasonable opposition by an unjustifiable prejudice.

Had the Senate jurisdiction of the Army appropriation bill? If they did, then how can this House call in question the limits of that jurisdiction? Under the Constitution the Senate, as the House, are and must be the judges of their own power, and conceding this, as we must, as a fundamental condition inherent in this as in all legislative bodies, be estopped from setting our limits to the exercise of their power.

The only technical question now within the reach of the House is the question whether the management of the Army appropriation bill as an entirety now under the rules of the House properly belongs in the hands of its Military Committee.

If this be conceded that ends all contention on this point—and upon this the gentlemen have expended their energy.

The sole question rightfully involved in this discussion is whether the Congress wants any legislation whatever looking to the armament of this country for coast and harbor defense.

The animus of the opposition to the House Army bill as amended by the Senate is not based on any fear of or resentment to an invasion of the powers of the House or an infraction of its rules; it is inspired solely and alone by opposition to the legislation contained in the Senate amendments to the House bill.

HISTORY OF THIS LEGISLATION.

March 13, 1888, the bill H. R. 8465 was reported to the House as an evidence that the Military Committee meant to secure legislation if in their power.

The House, of course, understands that the bill providing for public defense (H. R. 8465) is the bill from which the Senate in substance took its amendments, added to the House Army appropriation bill now under consideration.

The anxiety of the Committee on Appropriations to secure legislation can be argued from the fact that the fortification bill of that committee was reported July 26, 1888, after the Army bill amended by the Senate was passed by that body with amendments and returned to the House.

Discussing the merits of the Senate amendments, the principal objection seems to be that the amount of steel, $5,000,000, to be purchased is too much. If $5,000,000 on the Army bill is too much, what is to be said of the $19,000,000 covered by the bill of the Committee on Appropriations? The point sought to be made and the ground of the objection is that the $5,000,000 provided for rough gun-steel in the House bill is to be expended in one year. This is not so. The sum, by the terms of the bill, is to be expended in three years, and this gives the yearly amount said to be sufficient by the captain of Ordnance, Smith, namely, $1,500,000.

Mr. Chairman, the naked question presented to the House is whether it will refuse the arrogant effort of the Committee on Appropriations to usurp power, or whether it will rob the country of its needed defense provided by this bill, which stands now within the possibility of passage.

Sir, where are our defenses of which gentlemen speak; of guns or carriages for guns; of emplacements for guns and carriages; of defensive works of earth or iron or other devices known to war for the protection of guns if in possession; of shot, or shell, or powder? There are none; we are defended to-day solely by our fame and the convenience of those that would be our enemies.

The old forts and earth-works are gone, the guns rusted to uselessness, the arsenals empty, the very locus of the ordnance upon which the defense and honor of the nation rest is forgotten, and for the resurrection of its fallen and forgotten defenses the country has looked to the Committee on Appropriations since the day of the adoption of these rules in the Forty-sixth Congress, and has looked in vain.

Can you complain that the nation, looking upon her desolated defenses, shall, through her Representatives on this floor, ask for an intelligent and fearless resolution to act or refusal to act in her defense at once?

This is not a question of committee. It is a question of country and its needed defense, and I demand that this bill, which is the only hope for legislation at the hands of this Congress, shall not be killed by an immaterial quibble over courtesies or committees, but passed in deference to a great land whose peace is menaced by its helplessness.

Mr. BAYNE. The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has stated that commissions are the pest of modern civilization. I agree with him, and am somewhat inclined to think the commission appointed to locate a national foundry is not wholly an exception to the rule which he has laid down. I confess to very great surprise when I read in the bill that the national foundry was to be located at Troy, N. Y., in pursuance of the recommendation of the commission. I do not believe it was a natural location at all, and I can not imagine that it was.

I favor, however, to some extent, the construction of large guns, so that we may have a coast defense, and if there were no other way by which large guns could be obtained than by a national foundry I would favor the project. I shall vote, therefore, for the proposition of the Committee on Military Affairs, but with some degree of reluctance. I entirely agree with my friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] in the expression that the resources of the country should be called upon with reference to the construction of cannon. I can not help but think the officers of the Ordnance Department are not entirely just in their decisions. I am informed that one of these officers is the patentee of a cannon himself.

I can not believe a man who took out a patent upon a gun which he invented would be a very impartial judge of a gun invented by another man. I believe all the resources of the country should be sought; but I disagree with my friend from Ohio on one point. I insist the Ordnance Bureau should be consulted in this matter so long as it is a part of our system, but that does not exclude us from availing ourselves of the best information to be obtained elsewhere. I believe outsiders will present models for guns, and public opinion will come to the rescue, and in the course of time the best will be taken.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman allow me a single question in order to prevent a misapprehension?

Mr. BAYNE. I have so short a time I can not yield. I propose to offer an amendment to section 3 by striking out the words "Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y.," and to insert "Allegheny arsenal, Pittsburgh, Pa."

It seems to me that if this Gun Foundry Commission or Board desired to secure the best place for a national foundry and had taken into consideration all the facts, it would have chosen Pittsburgh, Pa., in preference to any other point in the whole country, and for many reasons. First, because it is centrally located; secondly, because it is in the interior part of the country, not easily approached by an enemy from without; thirdly, because we have all the materials, scientific men, skilled artisans, and everything requisite for the construction of guns. Any foundry that might be established at West Troy, N. Y., will obtain their steel from Pittsburgh. It will have to be transported from Pittsburgh to West Troy, be worked up there, and then it will have to be transported again to its point of destination.

Then West Troy is not well protected. The Hudson River is navigable to that point, and the same forces that could invade the coast at New York City could go to West Troy and destroy the national foundry. So that to locate a foundry at a place like that is rather an anomaly.

We have, moreover, in Pittsburgh the really skilled mechanics, and we have the most remarkable facilities for transporting heavy ordnance that are to be found anywhere in the world. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company agrees to transport a hundred-ton cannon. We have water communication by which we can transport the heaviest ordnance everywhere through the South and Southwest. Having all these facilities, having skilled artisans, having the material, and having the means for manufacturing the best possible steel, I think it must be apparent to the minds of everybody that the best location for this national foundry would be Pittsburgh.

Mr. HOOKER. What depth of water have you?

Mr. BAYNE. Ordinarily we have not a great depth of water, but when the flood season comes we run out boats drawing 8, 9, and 10 feet of water. We have abundant facilities for taking out in one fleet 600,000 bushels of coal in barges occupying nearly four acres. A hundred-ton gun could readily be put upon one of these barges and shipped out during the flood.

Now, sir, I suppose there is little prospect of getting a national armament unless we establish a national foundry. This Government seems to be so niggardly with reference to making contracts with outsiders, and then it seems to be so slow in paying them when they are made, that there are few who are willing to contract for a plant necessary to make these large guns. But we have now a new method of making guns.

My friend from Maine says that it takes five years to make one of these built-up guns. We are now making a gun which will not take more than five months, and if that gun shall prove a success it will totally obviate the necessity for the long delay. That gun is a solid casting of steel, bored out and rimmed down. One of these guns is now at the navy-yard.

Suppose that system should revolutionize the methods of making large cannon. Suppose that gun, after having been tested, should turn out to be an excellent gun, as good as those that are built up, then of course that would be the plan that would be hereafter adopted, because we can make those guns in five months instead of taking five years. And if we make them in five months, where do you want the material and where do you want your gun foundry? You want the foundry where the material is. Where is the material?

Why, at Pittsburgh. The very material out of which this gun was made was cast in Pittsburgh, and why a national foundry should be established at a point like West Troy, N. Y., where these heavy castings would have to be taken from Pittsburgh for the purpose of making the gun is one of those mysteries that can not be explained upon any business principles. It is susceptible of some sort of an explanation, I presume; but it can not be explained upon business principles, because if that is to be the gun of the future it certainly should be made where the material is.

Another advantage that would result from the location of the national foundry at a point like Pittsburgh would be that outside sources would be drawn upon. We have men among us, men distinguished for their knowledge of the fabrication of guns and all other kinds of steel and iron manufactures. Those men would criticise the work done in a national foundry. They would say what they thought about the character of the work. We have newspapers, too, which would publish such criticisms. It must be apparent that where there are the most people who know how a thing should be done is the best place to have the thing done. Therefore I hope the committee will adopt my amendment when it shall be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we had a cast-steel experimental gun in our bill, but it was stricken out because the Navy Department was already experimenting in that direction.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I doubt the propriety of any more talk in the House upon this subject, but perhaps it may clear the atmosphere if we get at the real question presented for our consideration. Now, I confess that on yesterday evening I was a little shaken up and put upon consideration as to whether or not the House was not about to be invaded in some dreadful manner by some wicked and evil-minded persons who had not the fear of our rules before their eyes; but after I had taken time to deliberate and collect my thoughts and settle my nerves I concluded that after all there was not much blood upon the moon [laughter], and so concluded that this was all a "tempest in a teapot."

There is but one question presented for consideration. The gentleman who argued this question yesterday did not contend that there was any question presented of the privileges of the House, but they did contend that there was some great question presented of the dignity of the House, whatever that may be. It is contended that the amendments are contrary to the rules of the House; and again that it is some sort of violation of the privileges of the House.

All will agree that the Senate and the House are independent, coordinate bodies. One of the exclusive privileges of each is to adopt rules to govern its own procedure independently of the other, and neither one is bound by the rules of the other, nor bound to take notice of them. Questions of the privileges of each House are not matters created by or dependent upon rules. Those questions do not stand upon the rules of the House or of the Senate. They stand upon no such flimsy basis. If they did, they would long ago have been brushed away. They are fixed and settled by the Constitution and laws of the country. Neither House is bound by the rules of the other.

Each House is bound to take notice of and respect the privileges of the other. Now what have we presented here? A question of order? Certainly not. That was presented when the bill was brought in by the Committee on Military Affairs, and these amendments, or provisions similar to them, were stricken out on a point of order made in the House, because they were not within the jurisdiction of the committee; and the House then went on and passed a supply bill for the Army and sent it to the Senate. That body, in the exercise of its constitutional function, made certain amendments. With those amendments this House is called upon to deal before the bill can become a law. Can anybody make a point of order against those amendments under the rules of the House, and have them ruled out? If so, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] ought to have made the point and had them ruled out, but he has confessed that he could not do it. The rules of the House do not apply to such a case. It is not a question of the privileges of the House. One of the great constitutional privileges of this House is the privilege to originate all bills raising revenue, and, by immemorial custom, acquiesced in by the other House, and the common law of the parliament, to originate all bills for appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DUNN. I would like a few minutes more.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have yielded five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA].

Mr. SPINOLA. I yield one minute of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Has this constitutional privilege of the House been invaded? All will agree that that question is not presented here. The Senate have not originated in this instance either a bill raising revenue or a bill making an appropriation. They have simply amended this bill.

They have put on amendments which, not in amount, but in substance and in purpose, have been agreed upon by the Senate and by the Committee on Military Affairs and by the Committee on Appropriations. So that the simple question presented, and the only question is, shall we agree to these amendments of the Senate or disagree to them, or agree to them with an amendment reducing the amount? Now, the dignity of the Appropriations Committee will be perfectly conserved, and the purpose of the committee will be accomplished, if they will move to non-concur in the Senate amendments and substitute their own bill for those amendments. We will all vote for that, and thus their purpose will be accomplished.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have agreed to yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA], one minute of which has been yielded to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Chairman, as one member out of eight from the city of New York, I desire, without taking any part in this controversy between the two Houses (for I have no time to do so) to call attention to a single question which was propounded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] to Captain Smith, when he was under examination on this question before the Committee on Appropriations:

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You regard this country as practically in a defenseless condition?

Captain SMITH. I do.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If a war should break out to-morrow with England, the cost of a thousand plants and a thousand guns might be lost in one or two cities alone within ninety days?

Captain SMITH. Yes; roughly speaking.

Now, what we want in the city of New York is the guns. We want this House to appropriate the necessary money to purchase steel, and then to have guns made of the very best kind known up to the day of their construction.

The question which I have read, as put by the gentleman from Ohio in the examination before the Committee on Appropriations, is a pertinent one. It does not matter how pleasantly disposed England may appear toward us at the present time, or how she may smile upon us, if war should suddenly arise with that nation the city of New York would be in a defenseless condition and unable to protect herself. Our deep waters would be of easy access to the ironclads of England. She has to-day the best ships afloat, with 20 inches of armor, which no gun now in existence on the American continent could penetrate. We have in course of construction one gun fit for such a contest, if it were in proper position.

Sir, if a war with England should break out suddenly, from four cities on the seaboard—Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore (leaving out Portland and all the others), a ransom would be demanded sufficient to pay the entire debt of England, and not only that, but the exchequer would be examined to see how much had been charged against the American colonies during the war of the Revolution, and how much it cost Great Britain to carry on the war of 1812. To these amounts the interest would be added, and those cities would be told that they must make good these sums.

Let me ask this House whether it is prepared to place the seaport cities of the country in a position where they could be called on, as they would be in the event of such a war, to pay the entire debt of England and all the expenses of the two wars with that country in which we have been engaged?

My time is too limited to discuss this question properly. With these remarks, I surrender the residue of my time to the chairman of my committee [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to be disposed of as he thinks proper.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the only issue in this long debate is whether the House shall concur or non-concur in the Senate amendments. The sole ground on which opposition is offered to non-concurrence without instructions is a matter of dignity, the Committee on Appropriations assuming that if the House should fail to non-concur without instructions its dignity will have been sacrificed to the usurped authority of the Senate.

Mr. Chairman, the Appropriations Committee claims special jurisdiction over this matter by virtue only of the fact that, according to the rules of the House, it has control of the fortification bill when one is reported. But that committee takes holiday, as it were, whenever it suits it in regard to the reporting of any fortification bill at all. It is only now and then that it does such a thing. It would not in all probability have done so now if the Senate had not incorporated in the Army appropriation bill the substance of a bill which the House Committee on Military Affairs had almost unanimously reported to this body; so that unconditional non-concurrence is what the Committee on Military Affairs wants, while non-concurrence with instructions to incorporate substantially the Appropriation Committee's fortification bill is what that ambitious and jealous committee desires. It is merely fighting to reassert its ancient universal jurisdiction.

Sir, it is a well-known fact that since our civil war the United States have done but little towards improving their Navy or their Army. Apprehending no invasion from abroad, no insurrection at home, we have failed to do anything in the way of experimentation, and we have permitted the world to go on improving both its military and its naval appliances while we have been waiting to see what costly experiment and science might develop in other lands.

Sir, we do not need any fortifications. Our civil war demonstrated that a mound of dirt is the best fortification that human skill can use in erecting a fort. We need only guns, ordnance and ordnance stores for our forts. Provision in this respect, by converting the Washington navy-yard into a gun factory, has been made for equipping the Navy; and this bill simply proposes to do the same thing for the Army, and provides plenty of steel for both branches of the service as well as to secure suitable guns for fortifications. I am sorry, sir, that I can not even begin my remarks fairly before I have to stop. As I see the Chairman's gavel is up, I can but go down in my seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate numbered 26.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert:

"For repairs to the sea-wall and wharf at Willets Point, New York, $2,500."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move non-concurrence in that amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The twenty-seventh amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Insert the following:

"For repairs to the works on old Fort Barrancas, in Pensacola Bay, Florida, $1,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The thirty-third amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

For the manufacture or purchase and tests of cannon and carriages, including two 10-inch carriages maneuvered by power, one of which shall be a disappearing carriage, and also including those for the field and siege services; for the alteration of carriages on hand to adapt them to improved service guns; for projectiles, and increased facilities for their manufacture, powders, fuses, and implements, their trial and proof; for experiments in the means of protecting torpedo lines; for compensation of draughtsmen while employed in the Army Ordnance Bureau on ordnance construction, and for the necessary expenses of ordnance officers while temporarily employed at the proving ground and absent from their proper stations, at the rate of $2.50 per diem while so employed, $600,000: Provided, That all purchases of materials under this provision, excepting samples, shall be of American manufacture: Provided, That of the above sum $10,000 may be used for increasing facilities for the manufacture of projectiles.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment numbered 35.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, that amendment embraces seven sections of the bill. It has been read over time and again, and has been inserted in the RECORD in the proceedings of yesterday. The first portion of it relates to the purchase of real estate adjoining the military reservation at West Point. The third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sections relate to the establishment of the gun factory and the purchase of steel forgings, and that I understand is the portion of the amendment to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] wishes to offer an amendment. I ask, therefore, for the purpose of saving the clerks the necessity of again reading this lengthy amendment, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may now be permitted to offer his amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Let the several paragraphs of the Senate amendment be subject to amendment, as they are reached in their order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to make a suggestion. As section 2 of the amendment relates to West Point, in regard to which the committee has unquestioned and conceded jurisdiction, that that portion of the amendment be non-concurred in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Chair has already held that that being a portion of section 35, it could not be considered separate from the rest of the amendment. My motion is to non-concur in the entire amendment No. 35, which embraces also that point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the request of the gentleman from Illinois to dispense with the reading of the amendment objected to?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now my motion is to non-concur in this amendment 35.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to concur, with the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. CANNON. Before that I desire to raise a question of order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask unanimous consent that section 2 of the amendment be unanimously considered as non-concurred in. It relates to West Point.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have already made that request; it was made on yesterday and the Chair stated that it could not be done.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It can be done by unanimous consent, I presume.

The CHAIRMAN. Not even by unanimous consent.

The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment of Mr. BAYNE was read, as follows:

In section 3 strike out in lines 4 and 5 the words "Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y.," and insert "Allegheny arsenal, Pittsburgh, Pa.;" so that if amended it will read as follows:

"SEC. 3. For the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings and other structures, machinery, tools, and fixtures for an army gun factory for finishing and assembling heavy ordnance, to be erected at the Allegheny arsenal, Pittsburgh, Pa., in accordance with the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board of February 16, 1884, $750,000."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point of order upon that amendment, that it is not in order in the Committee of the Whole——

The CHAIRMAN. But the motion is to concur with an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hold that it is not in order.

Mr. RYAN. I do not understand the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, whether it is to concur in section 3 of the Senate amendment, or to concur in the whole amendment of the Senate with an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It must be to concur in the whole amendment, or otherwise it would be out of order.

Mr. BAYNE. I made the motion in that form.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. To concur in amendment No. 35 of the Senate with the amendment suggested by the gentleman?

Mr. BAYNE. That is my motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I raise the question of order upon it anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I make the further point of order against the amendment that the selection of Allegheny arsenal for the location of this establishment is not in accordance with the recommendations of the Gun Foundry works.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a question of order, the Chair thinks.

Mr. BAYNE. The inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was whether or not the respective sections of this amendment should be taken up and amended separately.

Mr. CANNON. The Chair has held that to be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to concur with an amendment.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I desire to amend the motion to concur with the following amendment, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the managers on the part of the House, in conference on House bill No. 10334, should not agree to the Senate amendment numbered 33, and to sections 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 of Senate amendment numbered 35, or agree to a modification of the same.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I raise the point of order upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The point of order is that it was decided on yesterday by the then occupant of the chair that it is not competent to instruct conferees in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON. We are considering this bill in Committee of the Whole. It is not competent to concur or non-concur in the Committee of the Whole, but it is competent for the Committee of the Whole to consider this bill under any parliamentary motion, and agree upon any recommendation that it sees proper to make to the House. If the amendment should be adopted to the motion of my colleague, then the committee could recommend to the House that there should be non-concurrence with this expression of opinion on the part of the committee, and if the House adopted it that would be the end of it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman has not answered the point of order I made. He shows no reason why the decision of the Chair on yesterday afternoon should be overturned.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair is only temporarily occupying it, and does not feel like overriding, even if his judgment was in that direction, the action of the permanent occupant of the chair. He thinks that the proposition at this time is not in order.

Mr. CANNON. Is the motion to non-concur in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. CANNON. Then, certainly any parliamentary motion that is germane thereto as an amendment is in order, and must necessarily be so. I think the present occupant of the chair must have mistaken the ruling of yesterday.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend must admit that the committee can not appoint conferees. None have been appointed; and we can not instruct them until they are appointed.

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman is mistaken in that. It has been decided heretofore that the House could instruct its conferees even before appointed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But not in the committee. The question is to instruct the conferees.

Mr. HOOKER. In Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. My parliamentary inquiry is whether or not the pending motion is that the committee recommend to the House to non-concur in the Senate amendment? Is that not the pending motion?

Mr. CANNON. I will settle the whole question by withdrawing the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. All right.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I rise for the purpose of debating the pending motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will be recognized for five minutes, under the rule.

Mr. CANNON. In the five minutes I have I do not want to discuss the question about the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations and that of the Committee on Military Affairs. I think it is conceded upon all hands that if this matter were here without the amendments from the Senate the Committee on Appropriations would have jurisdiction under the rules of the House. I want to talk a minute about the merits of this proposition. It was first a proposition to expend $750,000 at the New York arsenal at Troy. That proposition is well enough. I am not objecting. The Committee on Appropriations, that has jurisdiction under the rules, has a proposition for the same thing; so that there is no point there. Practically it is outside of the question altogether.

What is the next Senate amendment? The proposition is to purchase $5,000,000 worth of steel to make guns. The fortifications bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations, now on the Calendar, proposes to buy a million and a half dollars' worth of steel; and right there upon these two propositions develops very largely this contest. I am inclined to think after investigation and listening to this discussion that it is not wise to buy $5,000,000 worth of steel, because the report of the Secretary of the Navy states that we already have a contract of $4,000,000 in connection with the Navy that brings a plant that cost two and a half millions in Pennsylvania.

The complaint has been made that there was no plant sufficient to make these large guns; but we have got a plant; and there were half a dozen bids when the contract was given to the works at South Bethlehem. By the report that was made we have got as good a plant to make the steel forgings for 12-inch guns as any in the world, at a price not exceeding $2,500,000.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. I have no time to yield; I will later. This steel is bought at 40 cents a pound under this contract. It brings a plant with a capacity enough for all time to come in this country in peace or in presence of war to make all the steel you want. Now, is it wise to expend this $5,000,000 in steel before it is needed? Is it wise to buy it ten years in advance of necessity and contract for it at present prices? I think not. The Committee on Appropriations who introduced the fortification bill think not, and therefore put it at one million and a half instead of $5,000,000 worth.

Now, then, one further word. This is substantially the difference between the two committees (waiving all questions of dignity) so far as the making of guns in connection with the Ordnance Office is concerned. Now the Committee on Appropriations put in a single clause in this bill which makes a proclamation to everybody in the United States who makes steel, "Make guns as perfectly as you can at your own expense. Compete with each other and then bring your guns to the Government of the United States and have them tested, and if a board of three civilian engineers, and three Army officers to be appointed by the President of the United States, says that any one of you has the best gun in the world, we will make a contract with you."

I think that is a pretty good scheme and a pretty good proposition. The Committee on Appropriations has made that proposition. The Committee on Military Affairs has not. In this matter everybody wants to make an appropriation. But I think it would be wise on the part of this House to express the opinion that the House conferees of the Committee on Military Affairs should not consider these items in the amendments of the Senate except to strike them off; and then the bill of the Appropriations Committee, which is on the Calendar and contains both of these propositions, can be called up and considered, and sent over to the Senate in the ordinary way. That is my notion, and I think that is the way it should be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that in all matters pertaining to the Government the utmost economy should be exacted, but it is equally important that we should distinguish between that economy which is true and that which is only apparent. I am convinced we should at once inaugurate measures which at least promise to enable us to keep pace with the other great nations of the earth in matters of national defense. In 1865 our monitors amazed and perplexed European nations. Now, in everything that pertains to naval armament and national defense, we are very far behind many other nations.

My friend from New York, General SPINOLA, says, very correctly, that these powerful and thoroughly-equipped nations could and probably would in case of war threaten to destroy our seacoast cities, under penalty of a ransom amounting to millions of dollars. I have heard no one contend that such a result is not quite possible, and the only answer I have heard advanced is that we would finally equip ourselves and compel the impudent nation to make full restitution.

No doubt we would do so; but would it not be well, by a small and judicious and timely expenditure, to make such a humiliation impossible?

Some gentlemen say that better guns will be invented, and therefore we ought to wait until we can spend our money to secure the best style and most perfect pattern. It should be remembered that a country must have men specially educated and trained to the execution or performance of the class of work necessary to provide the best character of armament, and even if better guns are invented at some future day we might find it difficult to construct them unless we had workmen of experience.

I have a great respect for the distinguished gentlemen of the Appropriation Committee, and would be among the last who would invade their prerogatives, but I think they will admit they have not accorded the question of armament the consideration it merits.

It is immaterial to the House, as it is to the country, which committee controls the matter. The committee which will act is the one wanted at this time. The country demands prompt, but cautious, intelligent, and conservative action.

It really seems to me that the question of national armament is one of such importance that a separate committee should control the subject.

National armaments run so imperceptibly into the matters connected with both naval and military affairs that it is sometimes difficult to determine to which branch they most appropriately belong. It appears to me that it would be very proper to have a committee composed of seven members of this House to whom all questions pertaining to armament should be referred. Three members of this committee might also be members of the Naval Committee and four might be members of the Committee on Military Affairs.

I am unalterably opposed to a large army, and I do not know a better way to prevent the necessity for an augmentation of our military force—so important to be avoided—than to keep up with the world on the question of material armament.

A gun does not eat rations, wear clothes, or draw pay, but it is always on hand for duty, and can easily be moved to the place where it is most needed.

There is another aspect of the subject worthy of careful thought. Any day questions may arise which require diplomatic correspondence. While the utmost courtesy should characterize this correspondence, the dignity of the nation demands that the language of its officials should frequently be firm and decided, and the world should be made to know that we are prepared to back our words with action should such a course be necessary.

Our people do not seem to fully appreciate the efforts made by foreign governments to maintain a military and naval organization.

These nations have found that measures of defense can not be perfected without constant and determined exertion.

We have had quite recent exemplification of the fact that nations whose martial process once electrified the world have been crushed because they neglected to give these matters the consideration which their importance demanded.

The people of France have never lost that love of military glory which they inherited from the great Napoleon and the soldiers and leaders of his time, yet on account of the imperfect preparation caused by inferior administration during the imperial reign of his nephew France was overcome by a people who for a century they had regarded as by no means their equal in all that pertains to war.

Mr. SAYERS. Did not France have abundant guns?

Mr. WHEELER. No; that was the great trouble. When the armies of France were put in the field they found themselves without proper armament for successful war. Their guns, ammunition, and equipments of all kinds were inferior and by no means equal to those of their recently-despised adversaries, and it was on account of this want of preparation that proud, martial France was in a few months overrun by the better equipped and better organized armies of Kaiser William, of Prussia. There was nothing lacking in the courage and soldierly spirit of generals and other officers and the rank and file of the French army, but all their woes were due to their being hurled into war with imperfect and inadequate preparation.

That the same spirit still exists in the hearts of Frenchmen is indicated by their devotion to any leader who gives even a faint promise of the restoration of their former great prestige.

It was because Boulanger seemed to give such promise that the French people so earnestly flocked to his standard, and it was only when further developments indicated that they were mistaken in his qualification for this one great purpose that their support became less zealous.

Our people are so patriotic, brave, determined, and zealous that we are too apt to rely upon these noble qualities of Americans, and pay too little regard to material elements of defense. We should always bear in mind that the blood of such a people is too precious for one drop to be unnecessarily spilled.

To illustrate the great disparity of our ability to defend ourselves against attack, I beg to call the attention of the House to a list of some of the vessels of foreign nations which have been recently built.

I prepared the data contained in this table two years ago, and gave a list of these ships in two tables which appeared in my speech in Congress of June 18, 1886.

I have condensed them in this table, but I should say that late improvements by foreign governments have made the disparity against us even greater than is shown by these figures.

This table shows that there are now mounted upon vessels of foreign navies 129 guns which throw a projectile 10 miles and upward, and that the caliber of these guns varies from 12 inches to 17 inches, and they throw projectiles which weigh as high as 2,000 pounds. It also appears that there are now afloat in foreign navies 66 guns which throw projectiles weighing from 900 to 1,250 pounds a distance of at least 9 miles.

My friend from Mississippi, Colonel HOOKER, was quite right in stating that the city of New York could be destroyed by foreign vessels running up New York Bay and bombarding the city, but it will appear that the range of their guns is such that the bombardment could be made effective without requiring the vessels to enter the bay, as some parts of the city could be reached by missiles weighing 2,000 pounds fired from vessels lying in 30 feet of water off Coney Island.

It will also be observed that Boston, San Francisco, Charleston, Savannah, and many other large cities could be reached by these destructive projectiles fired from vessels lying far beyond the range of the guns upon which we depend for the defense of these cities.

I will also append a table which I have prepared, showing the relative strength of the navies of the world, giving the number of ships, number of available ships, the personnel, the annual expenditure, and the total population of the countries to which the vessels belong.

It is true that in our country we do not depend on the regular Army, but I cite the strength of those armies to show the large number of men kept under arms by foreign nations.

It has been urged, and may be again, that the distance which separates us from any possible foreign foe furnishes us with an insurmountable natural safeguard against invasion. This may have been true at one time, but the great perfection to which the skill and ingenuity of man have brought the transportation of armed forces in latter days, shows that distance from an enemy can no longer be relied on as a guaranty of immunity from attack.

The experience of England within the last ten years has shown that a transport of 2,000 tons burthen will convey at least six hundred soldiers with their necessary army equipage and stores; and to carry by sea the same number of men, together with their cavalry, artillery, and artillery horses and wagons, about twice as much tonnage would be required.

The tonnage of the English steam marine now amounts to between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 tons.

We therefore see that England could transport, to any point accessible by water, one million men, with their arms, equipments, and stores.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, unless we can have an agreement as to how much debate there is to be on this amendment, I shall move that the committee rise to limit debate.

Mr. SAYERS. There are two or three gentlemen who desire to speak, and probably we shall want ten minutes on our side.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment shall close in twenty minutes, the time to be equally divided—ten minutes on each side.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes that have been allotted to me I desire to address myself to the question whether or not the dignity, the privileges, or the rights of the House of Representatives have been violated or invaded by the Senate in the amendments which have been put upon this bill. The rule provides that to the Military Committee shall be referred all matters pertaining "to the military establishment and the public defense, including appropriations for its support and for that of the Military Academy." I suppose there will be no controversy that all matters pertaining to the Military Academy and its support belong to the Committee on Military Affairs. That disposes of section 2 of amendment 35, which relates exclusively to the Military Academy. To the Military Committee are also committed all matters pertaining to the regular Army. Amendment 33, the first of the controverted amendments, relates entirely to the currrent operations of the Ordnance Bureau in regard to experiments in guns for the field and siege service, gun-carriages, powders, fuses, and implements, their trial and proof.

This amendment relates exclusively to the regular Ordnance Bureau of the Army. That bureau is a regular and recognized part of the Army. Anything that relates to the operation or maintenance of that bureau and its current operations relates to the maintenance of the Army and must be conceded to belong to the Military Committee.

This brings us to section 3 of amendment 35, the first seriously controverted amendment. That amendment relates to the gun factory. This amendment provides for—the erection, purchase, or manufacture of the necessary buildings or other structures, machinery, tools, fixtures, etc.

For what? For "an army gun factory."

Not for a heavy ordnance factory; not for a siege or coast defense gun factory, but for an "army" gun factory. In other words, it is for a factory for the construction of arms for arming the Army with ordnance; and if there is anything in the world that clearly belongs to the Military Committee it is jurisdiction of the construction of an "army gun factory." That disposes of that.

The next amendment provides for what? Simply for the purchase of material to operate the "army gun factory." As to the amount, it makes no difference whether it be a million and a half, two millions and a half, or five millions; it is steel to operate the "army gun factory," and if the Military Committee have jurisdiction of the army gun factory, as they must have, just as certainly as the Naval Committee have jurisdiction of the naval gun factory, then the material for its operation also is within their jurisdiction.

It does not follow that the conferees may not reduce this amount, and for my part, I say here and now that individually I would concede that it should be reduced half way to meet the Appropriations Committee; I am willing that it shall be reduced to two and a half millions, though I believe that it would be unwise and poor economy.

The next section simply regulates the manner of the purchase and delivery of this material, and that goes along with the fourth section and stands with it upon the same footing. Therefore that covers every section except the sixth and seventh.

Section 6 provides for submarine mines and submarine galleries and their concomitants for harbor defense, to be operated by the Engineer Corps, and section 7 provides for torpedoes, controllable from the shore, also to be operated by the Engineer Corps of the regular Army.

These sections relate emphatically to "the military establishment" and "the public defense" committed to the Army. Certainly it does not relate to the public defense committed to the Navy. It does not relate to a "fortification" in any accepted sense of the word. It relates to the Army and to the public defense committed to the Army.

But there is another and more conclusive reason why this House is estopped from claiming that these amendments are a trespass upon its privileges or dignities—whatever that may mean. At the beginning of this session I introduced into this House a bill (H. R. 1555) "to provide for the public defense." It was referred, under the rules, rightfully to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was considered by that committee, referred to the Secretary of War and to the Chief of Ordnance. Modifications were suggested by the War Department. The committee concurred in the amendments, and without dissent reported back the bill, and it now stands upon the Union Calendar of the House.

The Senate took this House bill (H. R. 8455, substitute for 1555) and omitting two sections attached it almost verbatim to the Army appropriation bill coming from the same committee. Finding this bill upon our Calendar, relating to the Army and the public defense, I submit that the Senate had every reason to suppose that they were acting strictly in accordance with the rules of the House.

But, Mr. Chairman, rather than to see the gun factory provision fail, for one I would be willing to see these two sections go off the bill, rather than "privileges and dignities" of the House should be outraged.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say only a few words in reply to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER]. I desire to speak of him with the utmost respect, and I am sorry he is not here.

Sir, I have never in my life seen a West Point officer who did not imagine that within the circumference of the Army was contained all the genius for war and for military appliances that was necessary to put the Government upon a safe and substantial military basis.

My friend from Alabama was very unfortunate in his illustration with regard to France. Up to the period of the Franco-Prussian war the guns used by the Government of France were manufactured by a government arsenal; the private industries of France had nothing to do with the manufacture of guns. What was the consequence? When the war came on and the French Emperor called upon the ordnance department to furnish the necessary armament he found the whole department honeycombed with incompetency and fraud, so that the French army was not able to meet the German forces upon the field of battle on equal terms.

Now, what is the proposition submitted to this House by the Committee on Appropriations? We say to the House, "Give to the Government sufficient money to put its arsenal in proper condition, and $1,500,000 with which to purchase steel, which would be sufficient to last that arsenal for more than six years." What else do we propose? We propose to appeal to the private industries of the country, North and South, East and West, to manufacture guns of a suitable character which the Government shall buy.

But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] ridiculed the idea of a commission. He wants these guns which are to be manufactured by private parties to be submitted to the Ordnance Department alone. Let me say to the gentlemen on the opposite side in reference to these private manufactories that for more than one month the manufacturers have been before our committee; they have told us that ever since the close of the war they have been knocking at the doors of the Ordnance Department in order to gain admission and have been refused. They have further stated to us that if this board is to be constituted of Ordnance officers alone, they would rather we should pass no bill at all.

What has the Committee on Appropriations done? It has recommended the appointment of a board to consist of three civilians and three officers of the Army, with a requirement that in all these matters at least five of the six members of the board shall agree. This, while giving protection to the Government, is fair and just toward these private manufacturers.

Mr. HOOKER. I would like to ask the gentleman how Germany obtained her arms when she succeeded in whipping France.

Mr. SAYERS. Germany obtained her arms from her private industries alone. The Government of Germany does not to-day manufacture a gun; it is that German citizen, Mr. Krupp, who furnishes Germany with her guns, the most powerful on the earth.

Now, let me say this to both sides of the House: Agree to this amendment if you will, and we shall simply have dumped into the Ordnance Bureau $5,000,000, which can not be expended within fifteen or twenty years if the work is honestly done. On the other hand, we propose to give to the Government money sufficient to operate its arsenal, while at the same time we say to the manufacturers, "You have said you can manufacture these guns, that you have the material and money to do so. Now, if you will come forward and make guns of suitable character, we will buy them for the Government." That is the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations. It is a fair, patriotic, just, and liberal proposition, which should commend itself to the sound judgment of this House and the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, the desire of the Appropriations Committee is to have the House instruct the conferees to decline to accept as a whole or in part any of the several specified amendments which the Committee on Appropriations claim should be treated in the fortifications bill. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has expressed indignation with the action of the Senate in adding these amendments.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are to bear in mind that there are two ways under the rules of this House by which a measure may be defeated, one on a point of order and the other by voting the motion down. It sometimes occurs that under a point of order a motion may be lost, and yet the majority of the members desire that the legislation be effected. It then it again comes up in order, by reason of a Senate amendment, the dignity of the House is satisfied when a motion to non-concur is carried and conferees named. When the bill is reported to the House again, if members are not content, it is not difficult to ask that a vote be taken on the question of declining to accept the report.

But, Mr. Chairman, if the House gets just what it wants as a result of the conference, I see no reason to quarrel with the Senate. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has my sincerest respect and confidence, and I believe if we could pass such a bill as he personally would make, a wise conclusion would be reached. Indeed it should be known that the country has to thank him for putting his foot down and crushing a fortification bill, the passage of which would have had the effect of paying many millions in excessive profits. I do not know who draughted it, and I do not want to know. It may be that the maker was deceived; fortunately the gentleman from Texas was not.

But while giving praise that is due to the gentleman from Texas I am frank to confess that to those who desire that something be accomplished this session the outlook is not encouraging, if we depend upon the passage of a fortification bill. We know that in the Senate one amendment proposing an expenditure of $121,000,000 and another $38,000,000 will be urged. Is it not better, then, to leave this conference committee untrammeled and to await their report? A vote was taken yesterday on the question of considering this bill, and by a majority of 30 in a total vote of 164 the House determined to consider it.

I believe the majority here have desired for months to pass the bill reported from the Military Committee. For some reason the Committee on Rules has not given a day to consider it. The gentleman from Texas declares that these amendments of the Senate are practically that bill made up from portions of bills introduced here by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] and myself. It is for the majority of this House to determine whether now it shall cut off all probability of settling this question by leaving it to the uncertainty of a fortification bill, or whether it will await the report of the conference committee on a subject that confessedly had its origin in this House.

We sympathize in the pride of committee felt by the gentleman from Texas and also with the pride of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] when he seeks to defend the dignity of the House. But, Mr. Chairman, if I am not mistaken in the temper of this body it wants this conference committee to act wisely, waste nothing, and to report back in favor of such legislation as is best for the country, all of which can be done under the rules of the House, quite in order, even if disappointing to some of our members.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee having risen informally, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, was received, announcing that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 3379) in regard to a monumental column to commemorate the battle of Princeton, and appropriating $30,000;

A bill (S. 3331) to grant to the city of Chadron, Nebr., the right to lay pipe lines across certain tracts of land;

A bill (S. 3248) for the relief of John W. Durr;

A bill (S. 3038) for the relief of P. E. Parker;

A bill (S. 2535) for the erection of a public building at Wilkes Barre, Pa.; and

A bill (S. 1493) for the relief of J. Schriber & Co., of Cleveland, Cuyahoga County, Ohio.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments House bills of the following titles, in which amendments the concurrence of the House was requested. Also, that the Senate requested a conference with the House thereon, and had appointed conferees severally on the various bills, as follows:

On the bill (H. R. 10604) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona, Minn.—Mr. SAWYER, Mr. SABIN, and Mr. MCPHERSON.

On the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Miss.—Mr. SPOONER, Mr. DANIEL, and Mr. PALMER.

On the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposition of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas—Mr. PLUMB, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. BERRY.

On the bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia—Mr. DANIEL, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. FARWELL.

On the bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes—Mr. SPOONER, Mr. EVARTS, and Mr. DANIEL.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 10165) to improve the mouth of the Brazos River in Texas;

A bill (H. R. 9977) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend a side-track into square No. 1025 in the city of Washington;

A bill (H. R. 9056) to protect purchasers of lands lying in the vicinity of Denver, Colo., heretofore determined by the executive department of the Government as lying within the limits of certain railroad grants, and afterwards held to lie without such limits;

A bill (H. R. 8783) to authorize the Kentucky Rock Gas Company to lay conduit pipes across the Ohio and Salt Rivers; and

A bill (H. R. 1560) to extend the provisions of an act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces, and for other purposes;

The message also announced that the Senate requested the House to return to the Senate the bill (S. 283) granting an increase of pension to Elvira M. Dorman.

Also, that Mr. CAMERON had been appointed a conferee on the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain bounty or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, in place of Mr. HALE.

Also, that the Senate returned, in compliance with the request of the House, the concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 39,000 copies of the third annual report of the Commissioner of Labor.

And further, that the Senate agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 907) to provide for the erection of a public building at Charlotte, N. C.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

[Mr. RYAN withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX].

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have but a few minutes in which to close, but I hope the House will make that arrangement.

Mr. RYAN. I will not take more time at present, but if this bill comes back here again I shall avail myself of the opportunity to address the House at greater length.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, to non-concur in the Senate amendments.

The amendments were non-concurred in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to ask information, as I intend to offer an amendment and resolution in the House, whether if not made in committee I will be precluded from doing so in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that affects the gentleman's rights. So far as offering an amendment in the House is concerned, the failure to offer it in the committee would in no way militate against the right to do so.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 10234), the Army appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same to the House with a recommendation that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote asked upon the amendments?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I apprehend that gentlemen will not object to the vote being taken in gross upon all the amendments except those numbered 26 and 35.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote will be taken in gross on all other amendments.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] was called away while the Chair was making the announcement that the amendments were non-concurred in. I think there are only two excepted. That is my understanding.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not know what the gentleman understands. I will see to it that they do get a vote upon the amendments they desire a separate vote upon. My motion only contemplates those amendments which do not relate to the establishment of the gun foundry and the purchase of steel.

Mr. SAYERS. There are two other amendments which I would suggest be voted on separately—amendments numbered 27 and 33.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are four amendments reserved. If there be no objection the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the remaining amendments indicated by the gentleman from Illinois will be non-concurred in.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SAYERS. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House insists upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments 26, 27, 33, and 35 to House bill 10234 (the Army, ppropriation bill), and that the House request of the Senate a committee of conference on said bill. And it is hereby declared to be the judgment of this House that the managers on the part of the House should insist upon the disagreement to said amendments, and should not consent that appropriations for fortifications should be placed on the Army bill, as that subject has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and all matters relating thereto may be placed on the fortification bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make a point of order on that resolution. As it is about the hour of adjournment, I will reserve the discussion of the point until to-morrow.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. WILKINS. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Banking and Currency on the bill (S. 1138) reimbursing the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by failure of said company.

There was no objection; and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced as conferees on the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. NEWTON, and Mr. POST.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask that general leave be given to print remarks upon the Army appropriation bill, which has been before the House to-day.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to make a privileged motion. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider touching the action of the House on the conference report on Senate bill 182.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the motion will be entered.

OHIO CENTENNIAL.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of a bill (S. 3182) and that it be considered in the House. I also ask unanimous consent that for this purpose the time of adjournment be extended for a period not to exceed five minutes.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 3182) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government, the Department of Agriculture, the Government Printing Office, and Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the Ohio Centennial, to be held at Columbus, Ohio, from September 4 to October 19, 1888.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the gentleman make a statement, subject to the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the extension of the time for five minutes?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do not object to that.

Mr. CANNON. I think we had better adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. CANNON. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks an extension of the time of this day's session for five minutes for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Five minutes is not sufficient time in which to consider it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. CANNON. I think it had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. KILGORE. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House under its previous order stands adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. HATCH: A bill (H. R. 11062) for the removal of the political disabilities of Gustavus W. Smith—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. C. L. ANDERSON: A bill (H. R. 11063) for the relief of Charles T. Murphy—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BLISS: A bill (H. R. 11064) for the relief of William Blanchfield—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHEADLE: A bill (H. R. 11065) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to pay $263.10 to James E. Southard—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WISE: Petition of citizens of Chesterfield County, Virginia, for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

The following petition for the more effectual protection of agriculture, by means of certain import duties, was received and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

By Mr. PHELPS: Of citizens of New Jersey.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 2, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RELATIONS WITH CANADA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces as the membership of the select committee under the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], adopted on the 31st ultimo, to investigate and report upon the relations of commerce and business between the United States and Canada, Messrs. HOAR, ALLISON, HALE, DOLPH, PUGH, EUSTIS, and BLODGETT.

ANNIE GIBSON YATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7708) to increase the pension of Annie Gibson Yates, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER], not now in his seat, called the attention of the Chair to this bill yesterday and intimated a desire to have a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and agree to the conference requested by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SAWYER, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. FAULKNER were appointed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, concurring in some and non-concurring in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10556) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. BECK. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House, and agree to the conference requested by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. HALE, Mr. FARWELL, and Mr. BECK were appointed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1106) providing for the revocation of the withdrawal of lands made for the benefit of certain railroads, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Mark H. Spaulding, of Northampton, Mass., praying to be allowed an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PAYNE presented a petition of 42 citizens of Hamilton County, Ohio, praying for the passage of certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9619) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at some accessible point within 1 mile north and 1 mile south and east of the mouth of the Kansas River, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3257) authorizing the United States engineer in charge of the harbor improvement of Mobile River and Bay to act as a member of the Mobile River Commission, as established by the laws of the State of Alabama, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10679) to grant the right of way through the military reservation at Fort Morgan to the Birmingham, Mobile and Navy Cove Harbor Railway Company, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3258) for the relief of Dr. John B. Read, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3283) granting a pension to Reuben Ash, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 9697) granting a pension to Mrs. Helen B. Brown;

A bill (H. R. 9463) granting a pension to Lucy A. Jordan;

A bill (H. R. 8912) granting an increase of pension to Almeron J. Patchin; and

A bill (H. R. 8617) granting a pension to Henry Crotsley.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5494) for the relief of John T. Robeson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at this time. If it takes two minutes I shall withdraw the request. It is simply to refund certain moneys recommended by the Secretary of State.

Mr. BECK. I object. I want the Senate to go to the Calendar under the rule as soon as the routine business is through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky objects, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. DAWES July 12, 1888, reported it without amendment; and the resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed, either by full committee or such subcommittee as may be appointed by the chairman thereof, to continue during the recess of Congress the investigation authorized by the resolution of March 1, 1887, with the authority and in the manner and to the extent provided in said resolution; and also to visit any reservations where, in the opinion of said committee, it may be necessary to extend their investigations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 3409) granting a pension to Wilberforce C. Eaton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3410) granting a pension to John Akey; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 3411) for the relief of Martin Graham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HISCOCK introduced a bill (S. 3412) to grant leaves of absence with pay to inspectors of customs and clerks in the customs service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 3413) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Cœur d'Alene tribe of Indians, residing on the Cœur d'Alene reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 3414) granting a pension to Emma Matilda Selfridge; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 3415) providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAWYER (by request) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PATENT OFFICE ATTORNEYS' FUND.

Mr. PLATT. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Patents is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate the names of all persons who had money on deposit with Levi Bacon, financial clerk of the Patent Office, in what was called the "attorneys' fund," at the time of the death of said Bacon, in 1887, and the amounts so deposited by each of said persons, together with the charge against said persons for copies and other dues; also, whether such deposits were made in pursuance of any order of the Commissioner of Patents, and, if so, what order; also other information as to the practice of the office relative to the method of accounts kept by said financial clerk with attorneys and others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed, so that we can see it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

Mr. PLATT. I wish the Senator from Missouri would withdraw his objection for a moment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the objection. I am not objecting to the resolution, for I think I am in favor of it, but I did not exactly understand it from the reading.

Mr. PLATT. In 1887 there was a financial clerk, as he was called, in the office of the Commissioner of Patents. He died, and he was said to have been a defaulter. Attorneys had deposited money with him to pay in advance for copies and matters of that sort. What I want to get is the information as to the amount of deposits and the charges against attorneys, etc.

The Commissioner of Patents in his last annual report recommended that something should be done about the matter, and the object of the resolution is to call upon him for all the information which there is, so that we may be able to act intelligently upon the subject, and follow out, if possible, the recommendations of the Commissioner in his annual report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

DESERT-LAND APPLICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] coming over under objection. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish the Senate with a list of canceled desert-land applications, with the names of the applicants, and the amounts paid to the United States on such applications respectively, and to state whether, in his opinion, such applicants, or any of them, are equitably entitled to be reimbursed for the money paid on such applications to the United States, or any part thereof, and also to state what legislation is necessary to enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to settle with such applicants on equitable principles.

Mr. STEWART. In explanation of the resolution I will say that quite a number of citizens of my State and in other places have taken up desert lands in good faith and have settled upon them. I know instances where they have lived upon the land ten or fifteen years, going upon it even before the desert-land law was passed. They took the lands up under the desert-land law, supposing that they could acquire title under it. Some of the land could not be irrigated. They have paid their money, and some have paid the entire amount, and they lived upon the land, but it is above where it can be reached by water, and the applications are canceled.

There are other cases in my State where persons have taken up land, but the water has been insufficient and they have been disappointed, having taken it up during the years when there was an abundance of water, and then for a long series of years they could not get water at all; and those applications have been canceled. I have a large number of letters in my desk reciting cases of hardship.

I introduced the resolution for the purpose of calling the attention of the Secretary of the Interior to the matter and ascertaining if any legislation is necessary in order to enable the Department to settle with those parties upon equitable terms. It is simply to get information on this subject to see if anything can be done. Those who entered upon the land in good faith and are living on it, who paid their money, perhaps ought to have their money returned. Where they have attempted to take the land for speculation and have been unable to comply with the terms of the law, there should be a different rule.

The object of the resolution is simply to get the information from the Secretary of the Interior as to what ought to be done and what the facts are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10604) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona, Minn.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 3038) for the relief of P. E. Parker;

A bill (S. 3248) for the relief of John W. Durr; and Joint resolution (S. R. 100) directing the Secretary of War to investigate and report the amount due to the State of South Carolina for the rent of the Citadel Academy.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks and so forth in the District of Columbia; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. LEE, Mr. CAMPBELL of Ohio, and Mr. ROWELL managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. NEWTON, and Mr. POST managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 1914) for the relief of Mary E. Hopkins;

Joint resolution (S. R. 17) to print additional copies of the United States map of the edition of 1886, prepared by the Commissioner of Public Lands;

Joint resolution (S. R. 27) for the printing of a supplement to Wharton's Digest of International Law;

Joint resolution (S. R. 77) providing for a duplicate of the compilation of the reports of the Senate and House of Representatives from 1887; and Joint resolution (S. R. 99) providing for the printing of the portion of the annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on Commerce and Navigation for the year ending June 30, 1887, entitled "Annual Report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in regard to imported merchandise entered for consumption in the United States, with amounts of duty and rates of duty collected."

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. BECK. I call for the regular order, the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Calendar being in order, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration in open executive session of the fisheries treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order, pending which the Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration in open executive session of the fisheries treaty. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion. We have the morning hour broken up every day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks that on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. BECK (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). I forgot at the moment I voted that I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is absent. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I should vote "nay" if the Senator from Vermont were present.

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BROWN (after having voted in the negative). As this seems to be a party question, and as I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia withdraws his vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Farwell,	Jones of Nevada,	Sherman,

Colquitt,	Hale,	Quay,	Walthall.
Daniel,	Harris,	Ransom,
Davis,	Hearst,	Sabin,

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. The reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with, if there be no objection. The Chief Clerk will report the treaty by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818; signed at Washington, February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that the further consideration of the treaty be postponed until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, the vote just taken I think conclusively settles the only question that can possibly be in controversy from this time on in respect to this treaty, and that is, that the Republican party of this country is opposed to the ratification of the pending treaty, and that the Democratic party is in favor of its ratification. Senators who but a year ago made strong and logical arguments against it—Senators who came from the committee-room in which the treaty is supposed to have been considered—have changed their views at this session.

We find that on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean the treaty is being considered as a party question, and we have a right to consider it as such on this side. We have no prerogative of right to propound an interrogatory to a minister on this floor, and we can not get an answer to such an inquiry as they do over there; but we have a right to judge from the documents here as to whether this is a representative American Government or whether it is a pro-English government.

I do not propose to discuss the details of the fisheries treaty. I propose to bring it to the consideration of the Senate simply as a question which concerns the people of this country—others than those engaged in the catching of bait and the curing of fish.

Sir, if it were that, and that only, I would defer to the Senators and to the Representatives at the other end of this Capitol from the Eastern section of this country, and say to them that I am ready for one to help you to protect your interests; but the treaty involves more than that. I would go to their rescue here with my vote; and I would expect every American citizen to come to the rescue of the people of the Atlantic coast with his vote if any commercial interest of ours was involved in a matter of treaty with Great Britain.

When I offered my resolution some months ago to consider this question in open session, I had then in my possession documents which I was not permitted to give to the public, and which led me to believe that this treaty involved more than the mere question of fisheries rights between Canada and the Eastern States. It concerns the people of the whole Atlantic coast. It concerns the people of the Chesapeake Bay. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] did not seem to comprehend what he delivered himself of in the speech in which he said he would invoke the power of the Federal Government to prevent Canadian fishermen from coming into the Chesapeake Bay.

I have upon this table an opinion rendered by one of the ablest jurists of this country, in which he says that, taking the sixth and twelfth articles together, there can be no question but that the United States Government surrenders the entire right of fishing in the Chesapeake Bay up to the Patapsco River, and then along the entire Atlantic coast within 3 miles of that coast. I would rather have the judgment of that gentleman than the judgment of the Senator from Maryland, because he is a jurist of prominence and acknowledged eminence, who has given this question his thought, who has studied it, who has looked at every line and sentence of the treaty. He comes not as a representative of any party, but if he can be considered as a representative of any party I can only reply that he is a Democrat—an American Democrat.

Such is the opinion of Judge Levi Woodbury, of Massachusetts, and I desire here, because I do not want to make my remarks any longer than necessary, to put his opinion on record as a part of the remarks which I have to make. Leaving off a part of it, I shall quote only that which refers to the Chesapeake Bay and the Atlantic coast.

I quote first from the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON], who said:

Who would not feel outraged if our Government could and should grant the rights of fishery in the Chesapeake Bay, for instance, to the people of Canada, whereby their fishermen should be induced to swarm down into our waters and give us a taste of the bitter experiences which those people have had for a century to endure? And I have not the least doubt if a bay just like the Bay of Chaleurs deeply penetrated the territory of New England, so as virtually to become a part thereof, with its shores dotted with cities and towns, and with a great local commerce from shore to shore, and Great Britain should claim the right to fish in its waters up to a line within 3 miles of its coasts, or otherwise to interfere with their dominion over it, the old Bay State would be the first, with holy horror and martial fervor, to summon her sister States to the rescue, and doubtless hundreds of thousands of men would spring to the front to rescue her from the voracity of the British lion.

Judge Woodbury says:

I think there can be no reasonable doubt that Article XII will justify a British claim to participate in all our coast, bay, sound, and river fisheries, and will preclude Congress or the States from passing any laws on the subject without the consent of the British. This right to fish and land, to dry and cure, must be extended to them on all our Atlantic coasts. No reservation is made outside of the State lines, or of the 3-mile line, or of private rights now vested. The treaty will become supreme over State constitutions and laws.

It follows that the Canadians and Newfoundlanders can participate within the 3 miles of the coast of the United States in all the local fisheries, river, bay, and coast; the shad, herring, lobster, crab, terrapin, bass, baitfish, oyster, shrimp, clams, turtle, sponge, and snapper fisheries of the Southern coasts are all laid open to them as fully as the cod, hake and haddock, lobsters, etc., of the Eastern States. State laws are annulled—

I ask the Senator from Maryland to note this—

State laws are annulled, and the entire existing private rights in bays and rivers now protected by law are wiped out by this one article of the treaty. Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, the sounds of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, and their rivers are made free to the fishing of the Canadians and Newfoundlanders, in season and out of season, in any mode they please to employ.

Mr. President, I should be willing to rest the whole case upon that one opinion. I would take the twelfth article and read it, but I take it for granted that every Senator here is acquainted with it. It is the shortest article, I think, in the whole treaty.

I recollect that since this matter came before the Senate in open executive session the governor of Florida has expressed an opinion upon it in which he said that the coast of that State would not be safe from the ravishment of the Canadian fishermen. I know that that has been the general opinion expressed by prominent men along the Atlantic coast. I know that that is the opinion expressed by prominent gentlemen and men who have given thought and study to this subject in regard to the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays—men who have something else to do than consider who may possibly be elected the next President of the United States, men who think as intelligently as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] did a year ago before special messages were sent in here, men who were studying the rights and interests of their people—have said that the twelfth article of the treaty would give the Canadian fishermen the very rights which Judge Woodbury says can not be denied by any judicial tribunal under the treaty; and that, moreover, it annuls the power of the States under their constitutions and laws to prohibit any interference with their rights in these bays and these rivers, and along their coast; and that the Democratic party of the Senate proposes to give away the last vestige of right that the States have to protect their own interests against Great Britain and against Canadian fishermen. I am not surprised at it, Mr. President.

As I said in the outset, I do not propose to discus this question in detail. That has been done by Senators who understand it; but I propose to say something upon its bearings upon other questions, upon other matters, its political effect, because the politics of this country is the essence of the liberty of its citizens. I know that the word "politics" is sometimes used as opprobrium; but the last analysis of it is that it means the greatest good to the greatest number, and the recognition of the voice of the greatest number as it is expressed.

I find that in reviewing these papers, while we were shut up here in executive session, deliberating as to whether we should open these doors, there went forth to the people of Great Britain, on the other side of the Atlantic, and I may say, to its subjects on this side, from the mouth of Sir Charles Tupper, a statement which has never yet been denied, that—

Secretary Bayard assured the conference that if the fisheries irritation were allayed there would be no obstacles to arranging for a free interchange of natural products in accordance with the policy of the Democratic party.

That is in quotations.

What has happened?

This is a continuance of the quotation:

Already we have the American chairman of Ways and Means introducing a bill to make free a number of articles that we send to the United States, and on which we paid last year duties amounting to $1,800,000.

Is any Senator prepared to deny that Mr. Bayard, the Secretary of State, made a private contract outside of that which was submitted to the Senate, as Secretary of State, carrying with him all of that authority which seems to belong to that high office? I ask, has any Senator denied that statement? If not, then it means that the fisheries treaty intended to lead up to free trade, and that being the case we have a right to consider the entire free-trade question in considering it.

But while I am on the matter of the conversations and correspondence of the Secretary of State, I have in my possession copies of two letters for which I think I can vouch. One is dated Gloucester, Mass., April 28, 1885, and it is as follows:

GLOUCESTER, MASS., April 28, 1885.

SIR: The officers of the Fishery Union desire to present the interests of their pursuits in this emergency to the attention of yourself personally or to the President.

GEO. STEELE,
President Fishery Union.

The reply of the State Department is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, D. C., May 2, 1885.

SIR: The interests which your association represents have already received and shall continue to receive the most earnest and abundant consideration on the part of this Department; and knowing this you will probably see little need for incurring the inconvenience of sending just now a personal delegation to Washington to present your views.

T. F. BAYARD.

GEORGE STEELE.

There are two other letters which I have read in manuscript, but which do not appear in the message and documents, one addressed to a gentleman in Canada and one addressed in turn from that gentleman to Mr. Bayard. Those letters do not appear here. I have read them, and, as I was led to believe, in their original manuscript. I telegraphed for them yesterday, but I have failed to get them up to this time. I repeat I have read them, and if they are not genuine letters then I was misled. I am told that this book, "Executive Document No. 113," has been revised. I am not prepared to say that that is true, and that of all the documents which were in the original those two letters are the only ones that are not here. Let the Secretary answer.

If Senators who have not studied this question will take Senate Executive Document No. 113 and read just that portion of it which relates to fisheries from page 288 through, they will have more information than I could give them if I were to stand upon this floor a week. I propose to leave that part of the question just there.

Mr. President, it is not to be denied, and it not being denied, it is conceded, that the Secretary of State had a private conversation in which he gave forth what I have just read, to the effect that the ratification of this fisheries treaty would lead us to free trade. Then it is proper to discuss that question in connection with the fisheries treaty. It is proper that the people of the United States should know what kind of an Administration this is. Now is the time and this the forum before which this question should be presented. Here is the place where Senators take position on great public questions, and their utterances go before the country as unbiased opinions to be used in a campaign away from here; but this is the place where the explanation ensues. I arraign this Administration and the Democratic party that backs it as a pro-English organization, as is proved by the record. They bring to us from the other side of this Capitol the Mills bill, as it is called.

Whether that is an American measure or an English measure I propose to settle by the record which I have from the English press; and in reading it, I do so only that it may be made part of our record, what I want to get before the people, knowing, as I do, that a single objection will prevail unless I read all as a part of my remarks.

[London Times.]

It would be hardly possible to put the free-trade case more clearly or more strongly, and yet, such is the force of words, President Cleveland shrinks from the use of the term "free trade," and in fact declares that those who taunt him with being a free-trader are deceiving the country. It is certain that the arguments which President Cleveland urges are those which Cobden used to employ forty-five years ago, and which any English free-trader would employ now.

That import duties stifle production and limit the area of a country's markets is purely a free-trade argument. As such we are very glad to see President Cleveland using them, though we are sorry for the popular infatuation which makes it dangerous to give them their right name.

[Saturday Review.]

It must be taken to prove that the President and the Democratic leaders have finally decided that they have nothing to gain by keeping any longer with the protectionists. They have, from whatever motive, resolved to adopt a free-trade policy. Nothing can be more explicit than the President's language: "The simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the amount requisite to meet the necessary expenses of the Government and to restore to business and to the country the money accumulated in the Treasury." In America this means free trade.

[Haddingtonshire Courier.]

Cleveland's message will, no doubt, provoke an immense amount of hostility on the part of many who have hitherto been favorable to him. This much is certain, and another fierce contest is impending in America over the principle at issue. If it terminates, as it may be hoped it will do, in the direction of a relaxation of those imposts that now so vexatiously hamper commercial intercourse between Great Britain and the United States, we may look to an impetus being given to our home trade that will go far to make up for the depression of late years.

[London Globe.]

As a rule, the Presidential contest has very little interest for the Old World. On the present occasion, however, an issue is involved which very closely concerns Europe, more particularly Great Britain. Mr. Cleveland has taken his stand on free trade, and, although the party managers have considerably planed down his platform, he is universally recognized in the States as pledged to initiate a new departure in fiscal policy. Nor can there be any doubt that he would act up to this understanding were he elected. The central issue of the contest lies between the maintenance of the present fiscal system intact and its modification in the direction of free trade. And on that broad question Mr. Cleveland's candidature naturally and necessarily carries English sympathy.

[London Standard.]

To American ears the whole message must be redolent of Cobdenism in a slightly modified form; more particularly the enunciation of the principle that the exaction of more revenue than is really required for the public service "is an indefensible extortion and a culpable betrayal of American fairness and justice." This remarkable utterance will be certain to exercise an absolutely paramount influence on the next Presidential election. Party names and party ties are thrown into hotch-potch. The governing issue of the contest will lie between protection and free trade.

[London Saturday Review.]

President Cleveland has devoted himself entirely to the tariff. It is impossible to recast this without touching directly the pockets of every citizen of the United States and indirectly influencing the commercial interests of the world. The President is careful to state that he frankly declares his indifference to the charge of favoring free trade. His policy, he says, may be called by that or another name, but it is the policy he recommends to Congress, and which, he does not affect to deny, must alter the terms on which foreigners have access to the American market, and on which Americans compete with foreigners abroad.

[London Daily News.]

The President feels compelled to characterize the attempt to brand him as a free-trader as deception, but for all that the electoral conflict now in progress is a conflict between free trade and protection, and nothing less.

[London Times.]

As was to be expected, the protectionists have taken the alarm, and, as our correspondent at Philadelphia informs us, they are organizing for a determined resistance. They are no doubt right in believing that, whatever may be said of preserving the essence of the protective system and of ignoring free trade, the tariff can not be reduced to the strict proportions of a revenue corresponding to the limited and diminishing necessities of the Federal Government without admitting a great flood of foreign competition.

[London Standard.]

Mr. Cleveland demands in effect that there shall be a tariff for revenue purposes only. No tinkering with the tariff will suffice; no readjustment of duties will do. The only reform that common sense can accept is one which unaffectedly substitutes the principle of unimpeded imports for that of tariff regulations.

[London Saturday Review.]

It may be taken for granted that the President has not acted without previously consulting the leaders of the Democratic party and securing their approval. He and they have taken up again the old free-trade policy of the South Carolina politicians, unconnected with what in the jargon of American politics was called the sectional question.

[London Post.]

We shall be much mistaken if the effect of this state communication will not be to strengthen considerably the case of free-traders in all parts of the world. It will be regarded as a step in the right direction by all who believe in the soundness of free-trade principles.

[London Daily News.]

The stone now set rolling will not stop until it has broken the idol of protection in pieces.

[Glasgow Herald.]

President Cleveland may say to others, and think what he chooses, but he has precipitated the inevitable struggle between free trade and protection in the United States, and that is tantamount to saying that he is on the side of free trade.

["A Member of Parliament" to New York Herald.]

To convert the United States is indeed a triumph. The Cobden Club will henceforth set up a special shrine for the worship of President Cleveland and send him all its publications gratis. Cobden founded free trade; Cleveland saved it. Such is the burden of the song all through England to-day.

[Cable dispatch to the New York World.]

LONDON, December 10.

The English papers continue to devote much space to what they call "Mr. Cleveland's declaration in favor of free trade." From the average English comment the public here has been led to believe that free trade is now as good as adopted in the United States. It is considered here (in England) that free trade with us (in America) is just what is needed to revive drooping English industries.

[People's Journal, Dundee.]

A great sensation has been created by President Cleveland's message, and if the policy which it indicates be carried out it will produce almost as much effect in this country as in America. The tariff reform which the President recommends goes as far, at least, as the abolition or the reduction of the duties on raw materials. Should Congress give effect to this proposal its immediate result would be an enormous stimulus to English industry.

[London Pall Mall Gazette.]

English free-traders would be well advised if they moderated the ecstasy of their jubilation over President Cleveland's message. Every word which they say in its favor will be used as a powerful argument against the adoption of its recommendation.

That is just what I am doing now.

Mr. President, the Senate can see the close association between the adoption of free trade and this fisheries treaty. But I find in that connection that it is provided as a concession to Canada, in the treaty, that the Administration will strive to secure Congressional action for the free entry or full interchange of salt, coal, and lumber from the Dominion. It is not only a fisheries treaty, it is not only a promise of the Secretary of State, but it is a promise from the entire Administration that they will admit salt and coal and other things, and add them to the free-list "when imported from the Dominion of Canada; that this Administration will exert its best endeavors to do this thing." That draws the line distinctly between the two parties, between the Administration here and the Republicans of this country, as I understand them, and the principles which they propose to assert in the coming campaign, and in all time, until possible circumstances may bring about a condition of affairs where they can better subserve the interests of the people of the United States than they can do now by abandoning that principle.

Mr. President, in this connection I present an extract from a speech delivered in the House of Representatives by a free-trader, in which he says:

Even the corsets of Connecticut, around which hover so many happy associations, or the brier-wood pipes of Knickerbocker are not safe from the interchangeable piracies of the tariff. Oh, the beauty of reciprocal rascality! Gentlemen seem to take umbrage because we call these tariffs, which take from one class to give to another, robbery. But I have the best ethics for the statement that the right of property is violated by the individual by cheating, stealing, robbery, or violation of contract; and universally, just as these crimes prevail, production languishes, industry diminishes, and the richest soil fails these few and impoverished inhabitants. But when Government lays its powerful grip on the property of the citizen to bestow that property on favored enterprises, it is none the less robbery because done under the forms of law.—Mr. Cox (Democrat, New York), tariff debate, May 17.

Mr. President, I have here a book which was written by the same gentleman who delivered that speech in the House of Representatives, a speech from which what I have just read is an extract, and since I have read this book I have not been at all surprised that he should have said just what he did, that we were all robbers, all rascals, all plunderers, who favored a protective tariff. The book is called "A Buckeye Abroad." It was written by a gentleman who was then a member of the Ohio Legislature, when he was thirty years old, written after he returned from a tour of Europe, and, being from Ohio, he gave it the title of "A Buckeye Abroad." He says in the book:

We took a pilot aboard and received from him one newspaper, which was cut into shreds and devoured by fourteen passengers at once. The breath of the fresh landscape is around.

Now, he was getting away from Scotland and Ireland, he was getting away from Germany, and, as this paragraph will show to you directly, he was getting in sight of the cliffs of England and breathing the air of a new civilization. He continues:

Now, I can write like a native of this round earth, for land is all about us. The cliffs of old England stand out in definite outline. Light-houses and mansions attest the presence of a superior civilization. How many thronging associations flit through the mind as I recall that here, not in fancy's eye, but in reality, stands the little isle of power, the home of old Coke and Cromwell, of Spencer and Cowper, of Chatham and Canning, and all the host of glorious minds with whom so much of life has been passed! Ay, in very truth, my eye has greeted the land of William Shakespeare and Guy Fawkes, John Milton and Titus Oates; the ideal realm of John Falstaff and Little Nell; the theater of Roundheads and Cavaliers. Yonder, verily, just over to my right, actually grew into life that vigorous feudalism out of which rose the fabric of our own common law. These remembrances come over me wildly and strangely. Old England! Yes; God bless her! With tears in my eyes I beseech Heaven's best benison upon her. I forget her as the land of ruth and wrong; I remember her only as the land of noble deeds and generous hearts. Her literature, from Chaucer's first uncouth song to Disraeli's last sarcasm, floats through the memory like a vivid power, transforming every prejudice into praise and every wrong into glory.

England—

Says the author of this book—

England, say what we will, stands confessedly the Christian realm. Her history, from the time at least of Elizabeth, is full of her influence upon the policy of the world in opening the way for the Gospel.

Not satisfied with the politics he observed and after hoping that there would be no association of church and state, I find here what I would not prefer to read in the Senate, this paragraph:

I hope the Pope will create no cardinals for America. It was rumored that Bishop Hughes was to have a hat. The ill success attending the Wiseman experiment in England will prevent Papacy from creating any cardinals in Protestant countries. His Holiness, who seems to fancy our chargé here sufficiently to consult with him, informed him that there was no foundation for the rumor of an American cardinal. Mr. Cass—

I believe he was a Democrat—rather advised him against the step; although he explained how perfectly easy the matter would be received in our tolerant country.

The author says further:

Priests meet us on every hand. Rome is thronged with them. As I write long processions of monks in black and white crape and in brown robes move under our window, chanting for the dead body which they bear. Some rich man has died and left a pall apiece to these poor monks to sing his soul out of purgatory.

Such is this book. I do not propose to bring into the Senate a question of religion, but I propose to show what free-trade Democracy is. I have read from this gentleman's own speech, which I had a right to do, because it has become public property now, that we are rascals and rogues and plunderers. Here is his book; and the debates of the House of Representatives, that body in which he delivered the speech a paragraph from which I have read, will show that when he was arraigned on that floor he pleaded the baby act, and said he was a boy when he wrote it. He was thirty years of age when he wrote it. He was a member of the house of delegates of the "Buckeye" State, hence the title of the book, and in one year subsequent to that he was made minister from this country to Peru. A Protestant as a Buckeye. A Catholic in New York, a Protestant in Ohio, he denounces the priests and the clergy. He buys his own books. Such is Democracy. Such is England vs. America. I guess now, sir, the only saving clause is that, having pleaded boyhood in that case, he will plead dotage in this.

As I said, the fisheries treaty involves more than a mere passing view of it would show. Still that is enough for me. I say it is politics on both sides of the ocean. We hear of what is called Democracy pure and simple. Jeffersonian Democracy, that Jeffersonian Democracy which says that the people of this country shall not hear debate on a matter that concerns everybody, as I may express it, from Passamaquoddy Bay to the Gulf of Mexico. And yet here is the report—five Republicans reporting in favor of considering this treaty in open session and four Democrats signing a report against it. That is Democracy pure and simple! Shut out the people of this country from hearing what you have to say! Let them know nothing of what is going on here that may disturb their commercial interests or even their productive interests along the coast! That is Democracy pure and simple; that is Jeffersonian Democracy, as you call it.

Mr. President, there is nothing more apparent than this, that the other side of this Chamber was made subservient to the will of the Administration, and they, therefore, indorse this treaty, and the Administration, with the Democratic representation here, has taken its position and can not, ought not to be, and shall not be, so far as I am concerned, allowed to deny it.

When it came to a vote on this matter, not a Democrat in this Senate voted to open the doors and let the people hear the discussion, and not a Republican voted against it; yet they call themselves the Democracy "pure and simple," the Jeffersonian Democracy. If the President of the Senate will just keep his ears shut for a moment, I will say that such was almost the fact in the consideration of the extradition treaty. When it was proposed to return people from this country to England for the commission of misdemeanors or to bring them from there here for nothing less than the committing of a felony, that treaty was postponed until next December, and in order to relieve the Senate at that time to do what they refused to do then, but two Senators on the other side of the Chamber, voted to continue the extradition treaty until next December.

Mr. President, why do we want a treaty with that government anyway? We shall never have a national government until we have whipped England for her deeds. She never leaves her foot-prints on any soil where she does not leave them with something that marks the same impress where she can put it down again. Our boasted Monroe doctrine is being annulled and wiped from the face of the earth to-day, and we find gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber saying we must arbitrate or we must fight. Has any one asked us to arbitrate? Has any one challenged us to fight? When either of the two propositions shall be submitted here it will be time for the American Congress to consider one or the other. An American Congress will consider either the one or the other when it is presented. Then it will be time for the American people to send other and better and more courageous men than we to represent them in this body and in the other. I would make no proposition of compromise. There is no such suggestion made to us. We have nothing before us but the ratification of this treaty, which involves everything that is dishonorable to us from the tearing down of the American flag on the Canadian coast to the time when an American Secretary of State could affix his name and the seal of this great Government to such a compromise on paper.

I ask why do we want to make a treaty with such a government, anyhow? We had a treaty under which certain criminals were to be extradited, and here are over three volumes of our books full of the Winslow case, in which England stood off and said, "No, you can not have him, unless you agree that you will not try him for anything else than that offense for which he is extradited;" and from that day to this he never has been surrendered.

England has never kept a treaty; she has never made one that she did not violate—I challenge a refutation of that statement—and especially with this Government. That is a case which stands prominently forward all the time, the only case that came up under the treaty of 1841, and there she refused to conform to the terms of her own treaty and asks us now to make another which concedes to her the entire right to fish on the whole Atlantic coast, up through the Chesapeake Bay (the opinion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] to the contrary notwithstanding) to the Patapsco River, and which concedes everything to her and gives us nothing in return.

That, I undertake to say and repeat, is the Democratic theory, and I want the Democrats to take it and keep it to the front, and let it be there, for it has been theirs from the beginning, and let it be theirs to the end. The Republicans have stood out boldly against it, and the party that stands out boldly against any concession of this Government of sixty millions of people, with territory enough to take the world in—the party that stands out, I say, in favor of a Government of sixty millions of people, with territory that is capable of taking in the whole world, is the only party that is fit to govern.

What do you want with a treaty with a government that recognizes no rights among its own citizens; a government that has an unwritten constitution; its judges created for life; a common law that was its pride and is to-day the pride of Americans, for they respect it as they got it from the mother country, as we once called it; impanels a jury with a lord chief-justice on the bench and a jury hears all the evidence, and the lord chief-justice says to the jury after laughing, "There is no case made; you bring in your verdict this way; I am the judge not only of the law, but of the facts"—a violation of the fundamental principles of that unwritten constitution and of the common law of that country and of all civilized countries?

Mr. President, I ask why do we want a treaty with a government that does not respect treaties, and does not respect the rights of its own citizens under its own constitution and its own laws? If this Senate arraigned a man under a crimes act, and appointed three judges of the United States Supreme Court to try him, would it not either appoint a committee to know whether he was a fit associate for Senators here, or would they not let the law take its course, and that man be arraigned for his crimes? Yet we find this government with which we propose to deal to-day by treaty, taking a member of Parliament and naming three judges of its own creation to pass upon his guilt or his innocence! I would sooner have a treaty of commerce with the Fiji Islanders. It becomes the so-called American Democracy to make such a treaty, but it ill becomes the Republican party whose name is derived from that which Jefferson himself assumed when he organized the first Republican party in this country.

We see there as the very basis of this proceeding in that Parliament which is to pass upon this matter, that a member, supposed to have as much right and privilege there as any other, asks by what warrant of right this member of Parliament is taken out, and Mr. Balfour, for instance, called the secretary for Ireland, says, "I am responsible," and that is the answer of the government to a question that involves the personal liberty, and possibly the life, of a member of Parliament. No warrant, no precept, except that the secretary for Ireland says, "I am responsible." Why do we want a treaty with such a government as that? I repeat, sir, that the duty of this Government is to let that government know that the liberty for which our forefathers fought, and which they won, is still cherished, and that we have nothing in common with a government that does not recognize the forms of law at least.

There has been case after case of that sort within the last few weeks. Here is what is called a government leader in the British Parliament asked if he did not have a conference with the editor of the London Times, Mr. Walter, before he made a certain report. He made an equivocal denial of it, and, losing his temper, he was caught in a trap and was obliged inadvertently to confess that he had met him, and then stated that the omission of the words "and others," after the name of "Parnell," was occasioned by a slip of the tongue in reading the bill. There is the greatest of English premiers, Gladstone, confronting that Parliament and its leader, confronting this entire administration, and he says to them that this conduct on the part of the government is censurable. I say we want no treaty with such a government.

I said, Mr. President, in starting that I intended to discuss this question without going into details. I have given the opinion of Judge Woodbury. I have no desire to go further with it except to say, which is almost a repetition, that all that has transpired in connection with this fisheries treaty indicates the policy of this Democratic Administration. It is pro-English from the President to the last Cabinet officer. Nothing has been left undone that would bring about free trade in this country; and what I have read here as proceeding from Mr. Bayard, the Secretary of State, to Sir Charles Tupper, never having been denied must be accepted as the truth, that the adoption of the fisheries treaty would lead to the adoption of free trade by the United States.

The Republican party represents the protection sentiment of this country. The Democratic party represents the free-trade element. I do not undertake to say that no Senator on this floor with Democratic proclivities will deny it absolutely; but, sir, when I hear a vote cast on this floor I know it is on one side or the other. I know it is for the Administration or against it, and there can be no doubt about the position of the Administration. When I hear at one time the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] make a speech opposed to the fisheries treaty or any other kind of a treaty, and I hear him afterwards advocate the other side of it, I have a right to conclude that there is some Administration medicine working around in the Senate Chamber and working with the Democratic representation influence.

I know of Senators on that side of the Chamber who say that they are for protection; others say they are for tariff for revenue but opposed to "war taxes;" but when I hear them say that they are opposed to removing the tax on tobacco, then I have a right to go home with my doubt, for if there be any war tax, it is the internal-revenue tax. The tax on tobacco is an "internal-revenue tax," the most inquisitorial and most offensive that has been known. All internal-revenue taxes are offensive, and the tariff is the only tax that we have had from the very foundation of this Government down to this time, with two interregnums, when we have had what is called by the great American demagogues the war tax.

I say, Mr. President, that I arraign the Democratic party right here and now, and especially the Southern element of it, as being democratic in nothing but in name. I could illustrate to you by calling the name of one State that has two Senators on this floor, where, if you were to withdraw to-day the entire system of protection, two-thirds of their own people would be starved to death in ten years; and yet the Senators from that State sit here perfectly complacent, relying upon a Republican majority to take care of their interests, because they prefer the Confederate idea and to be called Democrats. That is the policy.

Mr. President, if I have detained the Senate longer than it expected, it is simply because what I have had to say is somewhat rambling, because, not anticipating this contingency, I had no preparation at all, and I am sorry if I have interfered with any business of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, there are some questions connected with the discussion of this treaty that ought to be disposed of upon the resolutions which I had the honor to offer in the Senate, and while I can not ask this executive session of the Senate to pass upon those resolutions, the remarks that I propose to submit to-day have reference to that phase of the case; and so I will ask the Chief Clerk to read the resolutions that they may go into the RECORD in this connection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the treaty now pending in the Senate between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington, February 15, 1888, the question is presented whether the President had authority to negotiate such a treaty without the previous consent of the Senate; and

Whereas in said report the question is also raised whether the persons appointed by the President, without the advice and consent of the Senate, as plenipotentiaries to negotiate and sign said treaty were lawfully appointed, and whether said document is a treaty duly negotiated for the consideration and action of the Senate; and

Whereas said committee declare in said report that the matters to which said treaty relates were not fit subjects for negotiation with the Government of Great Britain, and that the time for negotiation with that Government on these subjects had passed; and

Whereas the Senate will consider said treaty on its merits, and declines to adopt the views of the committee as expressed in their report as to the constitutional powers of the President in negotiating treaties; and also declines to affirm that the time for negotiation with Great Britain on the subject of our fishing rights or the commercial rights of our fishermen has passed, or that the existing difficulties on these subjects are not subjects of negotiation: Therefore,

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the treaty signed by Thomas F. Bayard, William L. Putnam, and James B. Angell, as plenipotentiaries of the United States, in conjunction with the British plenipotentiaries, on the 15th day of February, 1888, and sent to the Senate by the President as a treaty duly negotiated for the consideration and action of the Senate, is properly authenticated as a treaty made by the President of the United States, acting within his constitutional powers, and is lawful and valid as a negotiation.

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the time has not passed for negotiation with Great Britain as to the just interpretation of any part of Article I of said treaty of 1818 upon any point of sincere disagreement between the two Governments as to the true meaning of the same, and that no act of Congress has declared that such time for negotiation has passed, nor has the time for such negotiation passed in respect of any commercial rights that may be claimed, or that may be needed, for our fishermen in any of the harbors or ports of the British possessions of North America, and that the existing matters of difficulty, including the claims of our fishermen for damages wrongfully sustained, are subjects for treaty negotiation.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the country has already been advised through the action of a caucus of the Republican party that this treaty is doomed to defeat, and in speaking upon it and in acting in reference to it my purpose is to save to the Government of the United States as good an attitude as we are able to preserve to it under the very peculiar situation of affairs that will exist after this treaty shall have been rejected. If I were opposed to this treaty, if I believed that it was a sacrifice of the honor and interests of the people of the United States, I would nevertheless insist upon the adoption of the resolutions which I have had the honor to present to the Senate and which I will now discuss, not touching in the remarks I shall submit to-day the merits of the treaty at all. I would insist upon these resolutions for the purpose of disembarrassing our future diplomatic or other relations with Great Britain, so that we might have some chance to provide the means by which the two Governments could get in accord, either in the amendment of the treaty or in providing for further commercial rights and privileges as between the two adjoining countries here, Canada and the United States, and for the purpose of putting our Government and Great Britain in respect of this matter upon the same diplomatic ground that has always been claimed and always been secured by our foreign agencies, by our treaty-making power, and by that of all the nations of the earth, the right to communicate to the Government of Great Britain what are our views upon this question, the right to receive from her the statement of her views upon the question, the right to deliberate upon the respective statements, the right to agree by reciprocal concessions, if it becomes necessary to do so, in order to secure what may be termed, fairly, justice and equity between the two countries.

I can not conceive of a more unfortunate situation than for the Government of the United States, possessing the enormous power that it has, to make a declaration such as is set forth in the report of the majority of the committee in very distinct form, which I will presently quote, that this is not a fit subject for negotiation in the first place—the fisheries treaty and the fisheries relations—and, secondly, that the time for negotiation has passed.

I do not believe either of those statements, and I am quite sure that on that Committee of Foreign Relations there were Senators, very important ones, too, who held the reverse of this doctrine, though they afterwards signed that report, or authorized it to be brought in. What were their motives for the change of opinion it is not for me to say.

I do not impute motives to anybody. I think a man has a right to change his opinion any half-hour that he pleases, if he has reason to change, so as to convince him that he was once in error and desires to rectify his attitude. But it is something that this country will receive, as I believe, with very serious doubt when it is stated on such authority that this question which has been in dispute for seventy years between the United States and Great Britain has arrived at that stage where it is no longer the subject of negotiation and that the time for negotiation in respect to it has passed. I desire by the vote of the Senate to free this question from any such unnecessary embarrassment as that.

If we desire to reject the treaty upon what we call its merits, if we desire to reject it in solido, without attempting to improve it or to reform it by amendment in any way as a negotiation coming from this Senate of the United States with the sanction of two-thirds of the body, let us reject it, Mr. President, by our vote, but let us accompany that rejection with the declaration made necessary—I grant you it would not have been necessary but for this report of the majority—that the time has not passed for negotiation with Great Britain about the fisheries. The subject is still a subject of proper negotiation. We have other very unsettled fishing rights in the United States in regard to which Great Britain is our nearest neighbor and the largest participant, if it has any participation at all, and those are the rights of fishery on the coast of the Pacific Ocean, in Alaska, and in the Aleutian Islands and in whatever possessions we have there, and the corresponding rights of fishing opposite to and connected with the coasts of British Columbia or the British possessions on the northwest.

I suppose, indeed I understand, that that is a subject of very careful consideration now by the two Governments, and that there is possibly a serious question raised as to whether the claim of Russia, which she had over the Behring Sea that it was a closed sea as to the fishery (which claim she sold to us, or partitioned to us one-half of when we bought Alaska from her), can be sustained under the law of nations, or whether that assertion of right on the part of Russia at the time she sold Alaska to us is to be confirmed, or is to be modified, or is to be rejected. Now, as compared with the fisheries on the northeastern coast, those on the northwestern coast, Alaska and the neighboring islands, are perhaps worth ten times as much as the fisheries on the northeastern coast ever were or ever will be. They are as yet somewhat unexplored; but the vast banks lying in Behring Sea upon which codfish are found, and halibut and haddock and numbers of other ground fish are found in vast numbers, betoken the fact that in times to come there will be one of the chief sources of supply of all the northern part of this hemisphere for food fishes.

So, therefore, we might just as well say that the fisheries of the Northwestern coast were not the subject of negotiation and that the time for negotiation in respect to them had passed, as to make that declaration in respect to those on the Northeastern coast. We desire to have treaty arrangements and regulations with Great Britain about the Northwestern fisheries; it is very important that we should have; and how are we to deal with them if we are met with a declaration in respect to the fisheries on the Northeastern coast on the part of the Senate that the time for negotiation has passed and that the question is no longer one for negotiation? What reply do we expect Great Britain to make in answer to that proposition in regard to the great Northwestern fisheries, which it is now so necessary should be regulated by treaty agreement?

When two great governments have a dispute as to their rights or relations, especially when the controversy grows out of the interpretation of a treaty, each of them has the sovereign right, and will always assert it, of taking its own attitude towards the question and will act in the matter with supreme independence. The reasons that influence its action are its own, and it is under no duty of explaining them. Either government can stand upon the ground it chooses to assume and refuse to discuss any question or topic that may be included in the controversy. The responsibility for such an attitude is a matter that rests with the other government to assert and enforce.

No such matter can be forced into discussion between them, because each is the supreme and final judge of its own rights. The ultima ratio regum is a judgment of the sovereign power, from which there is no appeal but to arms. The refusal to discuss the interpretation of a treaty necessarily presents an issue between the treaty powers that can only be determined by force, in some form, to be exerted by the treaty power complaining of its violation against the other. Where discussion has been exhausted also, the treaty powers having failed to agree, they are in the same attitude towards each other as if both, or either of them, had refused to enter upon the discussion.

The controversy ends and the conflict begins at that point, while a treaty is confessedly in force, neither party having abrogated it, nor having signified an intention to do so, or to assert a release from its obligations. It can not be in abeyance or dead, and can not be disregarded at the pleasure of either party. It is as vital, as obligatory, as compulsory as a law to the contracting powers as are the honor, dignity, and sovereignty of both governments through which it was inspired with its authority.

Governments living under a treaty are equally bound to good faith and fair dealing in its honest execution by sanctions that are stronger than those which operate between persons, concerning their private rights and interests, and by obligations that are as sacred as any that the moral sense of the best people enforce in their dealings with each other.

Those who comprise the personnel of the ruling powers in the treaty states have their own dignity and reputation to guard in the faithful observance of these great compacts, but a still more sacred obligation and a more delicate duty is found in the public trust with which they are clothed.

The trusts of government include the peace of the country, the security of the lives of men, women, and children; their liberties, their property, their homes, their industries, their society, their honor, and their religion. The highest and noblest care of such as are in authority must be to guard these trusts.

The fisheries articles of the treaty of 1818 are, by the clear avowal of the United States and Great Britain, in full force and effect, and both governments are bound by their sovereign honor to give complete effect to every stipulation they contain.

Many discussions and contentions have grown up in the effort to preserve and execute the mutual rights and obligations that are imposed by the treaty of 1818 upon both governments.

These controversies, except in the affair of Fortune Bay, which arose and was settled under a different treaty, that of 1871, have been between the local provincial governments on the one side and those in command of our fishing vessels on the other side. None of them have been mere private controversies between individuals. The local governments have dealt directly with the rights of our citizens, secured to them by treaty with Great Britain.

However much the treaty of 1818 may excite the pride and warm up the affections of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], plainer and less highly lettered men can see in the wreckage that floats around that rock in a sea of troubles that if it had contained some provision that would have regulated the jurisdiction, the tribunals, and the method of procedure in cases where controversies should arise, the treaty of 1818 would have brought peace instead of discord, and security to our fishermen instead of the frequent invasion of their rights through the action of the provincial courts.

That treaty is utterly silent on this vital subject. All this sensitive plexus of the most intricate rights is left by that treaty uncovered and exposed to the assaults and buffetings of the provincial or other governments without having reserved to our Government the right to dispute their authority or to modify their action, except by appealing to the general laws of nations or else to arms.

The fisheries treaties of the great maritime nations all contain explicit and carefully guarded provisions for the trial of such controversies, but the loved cynosure of the Senator from Massachusetts is more perfect in his eyes because, as to the rights and liberties of our fishermen, it is both deaf and dumb. This present negotiation, so abhorrent to the thoughts and so offensive to the conscience of that Senator, because it amends the treaty of 1818 by some wise and needful provisions for the security of our fishermen, does not go as far as he or the five wise men from the East he has named as the best men to make treaties would have gone in that direction.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. Does he think the treaty of 1818 would have been improved if it had contained a provision that the trial of our fishermen when they were exercising their own right should be before the Canadian tribunals with the burden of proof on them?

Mr. MORGAN. I think it is greatly improved by the present negotiation.

Mr. HOAR. That is not my question. I understand the Senator thinks that.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not propose to answer any irrelevant question.

Mr. HOAR. Oh!

Mr. MORGAN. It is very greatly improved, although the RECORD, by mistake, put me down the other day, I believe, as having stated that there was no particular advantage in this negotiation in that regard. But there Mr. Bayard found this subject, so important and so dangerous, with our private citizens on one side and the provincial governments on the other, with no guide to the adjustment of their rights but the laws of nations. No statesman who had preceded him had ever intimated a desire for any other regulation except on one occasion Mr. Seward suggested to the British Government as a modus vivendi that the officers of the navy of the respective governments should upon the fishing grounds take jurisdiction and settle whatever complications and troubles might arise. Mr. Bayard sought for better arrangements and found it a difficult task. He did this by attempting to amend a treaty that was pronounced indefinite and unsatisfactory in its language and too general in its definitions by such men as Webster, Everett, Evarts, and by almost every one who ever had a duty to perform connected with its execution.

Mr. Bayard could not abrogate this treaty; he was bound by his oath, as every man in this Senate is bound, to accept and enforce it as a part of the supreme law while it remains in force. His duty was confined to its honest execution. Congress can abrogate this treaty by a law duly enacted, but until that is done it is upon us an immovable obligation.

Neither Congress nor any other department of this Government has indicated in any form or at any time a purpose to abrogate this treaty. It stands to-day by our own agreement as a valid and binding obligation, and under our own Constitution as a part of the supreme law of the United States.

Mr. EVARTS. The Senator will allow me to ask a question. Supposing the treaty of 1818 were abrogated by this nation or by Great Britain, what would be the subsisting arrangement between the two countries respecting the fisheries?

Mr. MORGAN. Inasmuch as ours was a perpetual renunciation of the fishing rights except within a certain area, I judge we should have no treaty rights in respect of the fisheries, and that was the great misfortune of the treaty of 1818, that we renounced forever——

Mr. EVARTS. I understood the Senator to say the other day that he was in favor of abrogating it.

Mr. MORGAN. I said, and I repeat to the honorable Senator from New York now, that when a bill is brought in here to abrogate that treaty and to assert the rights which were abandoned by our negotiators which arose under the treaty of 1783 and which were the fruits of the Revolutionary war, although I know it would lead to war, I will join with him in making an effort to recover the fruits of the Revolutionary war.

Mr. EVARTS. Then it is worth while to fight for the Revolutionary rights, but not for the rights of 1818?

Mr. MORGAN. I would adhere to them and hold on to them and not give them up. It is not worth while to fight about a matter you do not intend to give up. You had better try to amend it and live under it. If we have to wear a yoke, let us put something that is as soft as possible under the collar if we can, so as to prevent the rubbing.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not wish to interrupt the argument, but to know what your position is as to the effect of abrogating the treaty of 1818; whether you think there would then be no treaty whatever, in your judgment?

Mr. MORGAN. My proposition is that until it is abrogated, while it is upon the statute-book, my oath binds me to stand up to it and execute it fairly. I am bound to do it. I understand that the supreme law of this land binds me in honor and in conscience by my oath to obey it. I look upon the treaty of 1818 as being as much a part of the law of the United States—the supreme law, as it is styled in our Constitution—as the judicial acts upon which rest the judicial system of the United States. And yet I believe that treaty to be the sorest spot in our history. While it stands I will execute and obey it as a man and a legislator according to what I believe is its just and honest interpretation. When I can find a party of Americans who are willing to declare that it is pernicious to the welfare of our people and that it was a craven surrender of the chief part of our rights won in the great Revolutionary war, I will go with that party for an open and manly attack upon it. I will vote for its repeal, for its abrogation, for denouncing it as having been violated by Great Britain, as it has been. I will, with such a party, make a clear and open demonstration against it; but I will not attempt to evade it and slip by it, leaving it behind me as a convenient bomb-proof to which I can retire in security when making a raid to capture other concessions from Great Britain that are admitted on all hands to be foreign—utterly foreign—to the treaty of 1818.

Looking upon this treaty as a part of the law of the United States, and it is written on our statute-books as a part of our laws, the question for us to consider is whether we shall amend it or repeal it, or leave it still to be executed by Great Britain on her own interpretation of its provisions. We can release the United States from its obligations under this treaty at any hour we choose by any act of Congress having that effect. "Shall we do it?" is a question that we have not so far even looked squarely in the face.

We can amend the treaty, but only with the consent of Great Britain, the other party to the compact. We can enforce our construction of the treaty against the judgments of the provincial courts when our ships are seized, but the choice of means by which this shall be done is a matter that concerns both our honor and interests. If we declare the treaty has been violated by Great Britain and that therefore it is abrogated at our election, and that its renunciations were revoked, and that we therefore resume our rights in the fisheries as they were conceded in the treaty of 1783, we know that such a declaration must mean war. If we make this same declaration and declare further that we mean to support it by nibbling off some of the profits that the Canadians make in having full trading rights in our ports, that may not mean war, but to borrow a phrase from the political platform of the great Republican party, it would be a very pusillanimous and cowardly attitude for a great and powerful government.

The question made most prominent in the report of the majority of the committee on this treaty is whether we will negotiate for its amendment, so that it shall fully present the understanding between the United States and Great Britain, or shall we try to compel Great Britain to accede to our interpretation of it, and to grant us other commercial privileges in her ports, to which the treaty makes no reference, by excluding the Canadians from all trade and traffic with our people?

To resort to any plan of retaliation which ignores the existence and force of the treaty while claiming that it is in full force, and equally to resort to lateral pressure to compel or induce Great Britain to comply with our construction of the treaty, can only be justified, according to our own honor, after a fair and candid effort to secure such results by direct and open negotiation. We have nothing to conceal as to our demands. We need have no fear in formulating them, and have no occasion to resort to any finesse, artifice, evasion, or indirection in trying to get our full rights under this treaty; above all we are not in the unhappy condition of being forced to "stoop to conquer" where our rights are involved and justice is denied us.

I have always understood, and that has been the burden of all our diplomatic correspondence, and of all the debate that has occurred in both Houses of Congress, and especially of the speeches that have been made on this treaty, that our complaints of the conduct of Great Britain and Canada related to the misconstruction of the treaty of 1818, and the abuse of the rights, powers, and restrictions that it included.

Whatever other troubles we have had, whether relating to the fisheries in the waters of Behring Sea, the exactions of tolls for passing our vessels through Canadian canals that discriminated against our commerce, the Monroe doctrine, the right to pass with our vessels through the Straits of Canso, the right of our fishermen to buy or catch bait in Canadian waters or ports, and to trade with those people, are matters apart from the treaty of 1818, and should be settled on their own merits.

We can not expound the treaty of 1818 by construction or by force so as to include any of those matters which are foreign to it without changing its structure and making of it a new creature.

Indirect means, temporary constructions made under the pressure of circumstances, are not the methods for reforming the treaty and increasing our rights under it. When the circumstances are changed and the pressure is removed, the treaty, like a bent bow, will come back to its original condition, and will again become the subject of trouble and of danger.

As the treaty itself, through its various interpretations by various people in authority in the United States, in Great Britain, and in her provinces, and at various times during seventy years, has been the real cause of all our troubles about the fisheries, I have thought, and still believe, that it was an incubus upon our country, and would remain such until it was amended or repealed.

Others differ with me in that opinion. They desire to hold on to the treaty to prevent, as they insist, the loss of all our fishing rights secured by it in the Canadian fisheries; all the rest, not so secured, having been forever renounced in that treaty. They also object to the amendment of that treaty. They demand that it shall stand for the protection of such rights as it secures to our people, and that we shall resort to retaliatory action upon Canadian commerce for the purpose of compelling Great Britain to accept our construction of the treaty, and for the further purpose of gaining other commercial advantages in Canadian ports, to which the treaty, as they admit, has no sort of reference.

The exact issue between Senators who oppose the amendment of the treaty of 1818 and those who favor such amendment is as I have just stated it. If the treaty is to be clung to as the repository and security of our fishing rights in Canadian fisheries (and I see no remedy for it until the event foretold yesterday by the prophet of the Sierras—the Senator from Nevada—has come to pass, and the inevitable war with Great Britain has ended), I prefer its amendment to the temporary and harassing expedient of gaining by retaliation to-day an advantage that may be lost or repented of to-morrow, or that will only continue for a brief period of time.

If our rights in Canadian fisheries are worth anything, they are worthy of the support of a treaty engagement with Great Britain that is clearly understood and honestly maintained on both sides.

Retaliatory measures relating to commercial intercourse can not continue for any considerable period without resulting in permanent non-intercourse, which means the destruction of our commerce with Canada, the extension of this ruin to all our export and import trade with Great Britain, and the general prostration of our industries, and universal bankruptcy amongst our own people.

Those who imagine that Great Britain can not do without our wheat and cotton will be surprised to find that a transfer of the British capital now employed in American railroads, manufactures, cattle herds, and invested in American stocks will open the wheat lands of Canada and India and will push the cotton growth into formidable competition with us in all her eastern possessions, and in Egypt, and in her South American colonies.

Those who consider that Canada is held to her allegiance to the British Empire by slender threads, and that her proximity to us makes her a British hostage for the security of the peace, forget that the quarrel we are now promoting is the quarrel of Canada; that there are ancient grudges between us and the refugee tories who fled to Canada after the war of the Revolution and engaged in the fisheries for support; that these ancient quarrels still linger in the tree, like wind-rifts, though hidden by the bark, and that they are as easily aroused and excited to anger against us as we are against the British, and that we despise the tories of the Revolution no more intensely than they hate us.

Annexation, absorption, or conquest of Canada will not be a love feast for many years to come, and will never be acceptable to Canadians until Great Britain has become hostile to her people and her interests. Great Britain could better renounce her control over the Suez Canal than the Canadian Pacific Railroad. Her fortress at Gibraltar is not so important as her possessions on Vancouver Island. The future supplies of wheat, lumber, and fish that Canada will send to Great Britain are worth more than the $500,000,000 she would expend in burning the cities on the lakes and the seaboard of the United States.

True, we could take Canada and other British possessions, but what this free Republic, that governs only through the consent of the governed, could do with a people and a country like Canada, when subjected to our power by conquest, is a problem that needs to be solved before we set out on the expedition that is to result in the subjugation of Canada. It is a long and perplexing calculation that we must make when we count the cost of retaliation and non-intercourse with our nearest neighbor. I think it is easier, cheaper, and more honorable to live in peace with Canada than it could be even to extend our limits to the north pole at a time when such a policy with such a result would bring in a brave and strong people by force and against their will.

I therefore prefer negotiation to retaliation. We have negotiated in part. The President has opened the negotiation and now submits his work to the Senate for our advice and consent. We are engaged in determining what advice we will give the President and how far we will consent to what he has done.

In this stage of our work we are negotiators, just as the President is. We can shape this treaty as we choose, through our right to amend it. If Great Britain does not accept our amendments, that ends the matter. If she should accept, then we have a treaty that must be satisfactory to two-thirds of the Senate.

The Senate can not fail to remember, or, if we forget, the country will remember, that we are clothed with all the powers of negotiation, through the President as the executive head of our Government, to improve this negotiation so that it shall express the will of two-thirds of this body.

No treaty can contain a sentence or clause that does not meet the approval of two-thirds of this body. Are we prepared to admit that we are not equal to the test of formulating a fisheries treaty with Great Britain that will secure to our people every right and every privilege that is claimed for them in this debate? If this treaty does not suit us, let us write one, to which two-thirds of the Senate will agree, that does suit us, and advise the President to submit it to Great Britain for ratification or rejection. We can in this way formulate our contention as to our fishery rights and the commercial rights of our fishermen so that they can not be misunderstood. Without this consensus of opinion in the Senate we shall pass through this debate and reject this treaty without furnishing to the world any distinct idea of what we believe to be the true definition of the rights that we claim.

No man can ascertain from this debate any distinct proposition on which even a majority of the Senate are agreed, to say nothing of what two-thirds of the Senate would unite in asserting. All that we will have established is that the Senate will neither propose a negotiation with Great Britain that will settle the fishery disputes, nor will it assent to that which the President has concluded, nor will it amend that negotiation. We refuse to negotiate, and are driven to the ground assumed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, that the fisheries are not a fit subject for negotiation, that the time for negotiation has passed, and that both the Senate and the Congress have instructed the President that his business and duty are confined to retaliation under the act of March, 1887.

Mature reflection has convinced me as to two facts that were absolutely controlling in the situation we occupy in reference to the northeastern British provinces in connection with the fisheries.

First, that all our rights of fishery within the territorial jurisdiction, being the joint rights of a tenancy in common with the people on those coasts, they can only be enjoyed, beneficially, by agreement between the countries and by good will amongst the fishermen; and second that intercourse in such joint enjoyment of the fisheries can not be properly or safely regulated by means of retaliatory laws or proceedings.

I can conceive of nothing more difficult than the task of preserving to our fishermen their full and just rights in a joint fishery on the distant coasts of Newfoundland and Labrador, amongst a people whose commerce and ships are excluded from our ports and whose jealousy of their rights in respect of their sole means of subsistence is further inflamed by unfriendly or hostile relations between their government and ours. I can scarcely see that it is possible that our fishermen can safely and peacefully enjoy the rights left to them by the treaty of 1818 while the two countries are engaged in repressing and destroying the commerce of each other, with all the irritations that such relations will engender, unless we send out our war ships, if we should have any, to convoy and protect our fishing fleets.

A treaty right is of little worth if it must be constantly protected by an armed force.

This joint ownership of the fisheries is the great controlling fact that makes it indispensable that its enjoyments should be regulated, controlled, and secured by agreement with the other joint owner, rather than by disagreement, contention, strife, retaliation, and retorsion.

We have seen that, with the best efforts of both governments to promote harmony and peace among the men whose ships visit the same waters to gather, annually, the rich harvest of the fisheries, by treaties with broad provisions for reciprocity, we have been frequently driven to the verge of war by their jealousies and disagreements.

Neither party has ever tried the efficacy of retaliation to prevent or cure these troubles. If we are forced now to this resort it is a certain result that we shall lose the benefit of our joint fishing rights under the treaty of 1818, unless we send out our fishermen under the convoy of our Navy.

It goes without saying that any exercise of force by either party in the fishing waters to correct an injustice or prevent an abuse would almost certainly lead to hostile collision between our men of war and to open hostilities.

These and many like reasons impress me with the conviction that the nature of our rights in the fisheries of the British provinces compels us to prefer the certainty and security of treaty agreements for their regulation to that uncertain and doubtful expedient which is found in unfriendly retaliation.

Therefore, I could only admit the conclusion that the time for negotiation with Great Britain about our fishing rights had passed, with the most serious apprehensions that the time had arrived to state our demands in the clearest manner, and to enforce them by all the means in our power.

If there is a middle ground between our refusal to negotiate and the declaration of an ultimatum, to which we will adhere to the uttermost, in reference to this joint right of fishery in the provincial waters, it is certainly very debatable ground. It is not ground upon which these sovereign nations confront each other in open and upright controversy to settle great questions definitely and fairly in whatever form of contest may be required. It is rather the ground over which the raider steals a march in search of booty, and hopes to exhaust his antagonist by cutting off his supplies and destroying his resources.

This might be good strategy in war, but it is a very weak and shambling policy in respect of our commercial dealings. Rather than resort to this policy, for which we made ample provision by law in 1850, in a statute that is still in force, and under the worst experience we have ever had of the harsh execution of the British view of the treaty of 1818, we have given the Canadians twenty-four years of importation of free fish out of the thirty-eight years since 1850, and in 1870, when the Republican party was in full possession of the Government, they put fresh fish on the free-list and have kept it there to this hour.

Neither Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Johnson, General Grant, Mr. Hayes, or Mr. Arthur ever attempted to resort to the retaliatory law of 1850 to meet any of the many acts of alleged aggression and the constant denial of trading privileges to our fishermen, although they were as severe and defiant as they were ever before or since the twenty-four years during which they held the Presidency, with complete control of every branch of the Government, including the judiciary and a majority in both branches of Congress, that was eager to record their decrees. More than three hundred cases of seizure of our fishing vessels by the provincial authorities had occurred during and antecedent to their possession of the Government, and except the pious episode of the Sunday fishing in Fortune Bay, not one of the five Cabinet officers now in this body, Mr. CAMERON, Mr. EVARTS, Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. CHANDLER, who held high places in those administrations, can show a line in print that contained even a movement in the direction of a proclamation of non-intercourse or retaliation upon Canada under the law of 1850.

There were the grievances, old and new, quite as aggravated and galling to our pride and damaging to our interests as any that have occurred since Arthur's administration; there was the law of 1850 on the statute-book, giving the Secretary of the Treasury and the President all the power that was needed to retaliate upon Canada, and here are the ex-Secretaries of the Treasury, of the Interior, of the Navy, of War, and of State, abusing with coarse epithets the present Administration and putting that abuse in a report from a committee of the Senate, and in speeches on this floor, because the President sought to come to a fair agreement with Great Britain, if that were possible, with the consent of the Senate, before resorting to the act of 1850, or that of 1887, to compel that Government to do us justice.

Those ex-Secretaries demand that the door of negotiation shall be immediately shut, so as to force Mr. Cleveland to the sole alternative of retaliation, and the probable result of open hostilities with Great Britain, while for twenty-four years they and their powerful party neither retaliated nor treated, and very mildly complained about the wrongs of our fishermen, some fresh and some old and moss-grown with neglect. Why did they not retaliate? Why did they not force the country into war? The answer is too plain and too humiliating to be stated with composure by any American.

In the treaty of 1871 we, in effect, condoned every previous cause of complaint and merged the wounded pride and the uncollected damages for past wrongs to our fishermen in the new arrangement, by which we admitted fish to our markets free of duty, and agreed to pay a sum which turned out to be $5,500,000 for peace, fraternity, and poor fishing along the Canadian coasts.

In fact we used these inducements in order to make it easier for Great Britain to agree with us on the Alabama claims, and some other arrangements for the use of the lakes as channels of trade and commerce.

These ex-Secretaries and their party, having resorted to negotiation instead of retaliation, made this treaty of 1871 to cover the very questions that now exist; that appeared in flagrant wrongs in 1869 and 1870, and then subsided for ten years under this five-and-a-half-million-dollar poultice and appeared again in 1885; and now they are here crying out against a President for negotiating a treaty, and sending it to them for ratification, amendment, or rejection, which is a fair, direct, and just settlement of these disputes. Why may we not now treat with Great Britain about these same troubles and misunderstandings on the basis of mutual concession, in order to reach a common and satisfactory agreement, when these ex-Secretaries paid Great Britain five and a half million dollars for the purchase of ten years' peace on these same questions?

They denounce this treaty in their national party platform as a pusillanimous and cowardly surrender, and are scarcely less sparing of epithets towards it and the President in their speeches in the Senate after they have given free fish to Canada and $5,500,000 in money for the right to fish within the 3-mile limit as fixed by the treaty of 1818 and to land on certain coasts and shores for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish. This was the only additional liberty secured to our fishermen, for which these ex-Secretaries and their party paid these enormous sums and gave them the right also to fish in our waters, on our seacoasts and shores north of 39° north latitude, extending this privilege 3 degrees farther south on our shores than was done in the treaty of 1854.

Our fishermen needed the commercial privileges for which we now clamor in such belligerent notes in 1871 quite as much as they are needed now. They were as important then as they are now, but the treaty of 1871, sent to the Senate by General Grant and confirmed without opposition, made no allusion to any commercial rights for our fishermen. The negotiators had their instructions from the President, in which these commercial rights were distinctly called to their attention, but the treaty contained no word on the subject. Senators scout a negotiation as being pusillanimous and cowardly, because it does not make as full provision for the commercial rights of our fishermen as they now claim, while remembering that they and their party made the treaty of 1871 without an allusion to such rights. They made additions to our treaty rights under the treaty of 1818 in these words:

ARTICLE XVIII.

It is agreed by the high contracting parties that, in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen by the convention between the United States and Great Britain, signed at London on the 20th day of October, 1818, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, the liberty, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the seacoasts and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the colony of Prince Edward's Island, and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore, with permission to land upon the said coasts and shores and islands, and also upon the Magdalen Islands, for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish; provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the rights of private property, or with British fishermen, in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose.

It is understood that the above-mentioned liberty applies solely to the sea fishery, and that the salmon and shad fisheries, and all other fisheries in rivers and the mouths of rivers, are hereby reserved exclusively for British fishermen.

They stopped with these additions to our side of the subject and gave to the Canadians full fishing rights on our coasts down to 39° north latitude. Can any of the five Secretaries or the Senators who were in this body in May, 1871, answer to our despoiled fishermen why it was that this treaty of 1871 admitted all fish and fish-oil free of duty and mulcted us in a sum of $5,500,000, and gave British fishermen the equal rights with ourselves to fish on our shores down to 39° north latitude? Were not all these gentlemen on the British side of that question? Let them answer these questions, or else forever after hold their peace on the subject of pusillanimous and cowardly treaties and from any further accusations against us that we are espousing the British or Canadian side of this controversy.

What has become of the recent lofty boast of American statesmanship, that we intend to demand and secure commercial rights for our fishermen in the ports of Canada? What was done to secure those rights in the treaty of 1871? Who moved in that direction? Who intimated a desire for such commercial rights in 1871? None of the able ex-Secretaries, none of the Senators on this floor; and yet there are many here now who were either in this House or the other in 1871.

Mr. EVARTS. Will the Senator allow me to raise a point of consideration? The Senator must be aware that during the prevalence of the treaty of 1871 all these commercial rights were conceded, practically.

Mr. MORGAN. No, the Senator uses the wrong word. "Concede" does not cover the subject. That is not the fact.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not say the treaty, but the action.

Mr. MORGAN. Nor in any other way.

Mr. EVARTS. The action.

Mr. MORGAN. A mere indulgence was granted to us, precisely of the same character as is granted now under the modus vivendi established in the protocol of the present treaty.

Mr. EVARTS. I had not asked the Senator's attention to any other consideration than the mere fact that during the prevalence of the treaty of 1871 these commercial privileges were enjoyed by our people.

Mr. MORGAN. That was not in consequence of the treaty, but because of the changed commercial relationship between those people and our people, whereby it became more profitable to the Canadians to have our people in their ports than it would have been to have excluded them. When we came to settle the damages in the Halifax Commission upon this very question the British representative put in a demand for the privileges of commerce enjoyed under that treaty. Our reply to it was, "The treaty is silent on the subject, and what you have granted us in the way of commerce has been a mere gratuity for your own advantage and benefit, and one that you could withdraw at any time." Therefore it was not conceded.

Mr. EVARTS. I did not state it as a concession. I merely asked whether the Senator agreed that during the period of time the treaty of 1871 was in force commercial privileges as we claim them for fishermen were enjoyed.

Mr. MORGAN. That is very true.

Mr. EVARTS. Very well; that is all I wanted to ask.

Mr. MORGAN. That is very true; they were enjoyed as an act of grace and favor by the Canadians to our people, and for their own private advantage and benefit.

Mr. PUGH. Will my colleague allow me to suggest that the fact that commercial privileges were enjoyed while the treaty of 1871 was in force is no reason why they were not provided for in the treaty itself?

Mr. MORGAN. Surely not.

Mr. PUGH. Those commercial privileges were not enjoyed prior to the formation of the treaty of 1871, and the fact that they were enjoyed while that treaty was in operation is no answer to the failure of the Government to provide for them in the treaty of 1871.

Mr. EVARTS. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. EVARTS. I had no purpose of interposing the inquiry either to derange the argument of my friend from Alabama, or to anticipate my own on that subject. My purpose was to see whether we can agree about the fact, and then the reasoning may go on so far as you please on your side.

Mr. MORGAN. We agree about the fact that under the benign influences of the treaty of 1871, which gave free fish and free oil to the citizens of both countries, and which made a large promise of money to the Canadians for the value of their fisheries over and above the value of their enjoyment of our fisheries, they were in very good humor, received us very kindly and very hospitably; but the moment that treaty was put an end to they flared up again, and getting back on the hard lines of the treaty of 1818 they undertook to enforce it according to their own interpretation.

There was no object during the pendency of the treaty of 1871 for excluding our men under the treaty of 1818, or making any point at all, because they had the right to go up to the shores and fish on any part of the coast, just as much right as the Canadians themselves had.

If you put this treaty in force you will find that the same state of affairs will occur again in Canada which occurred under the treaty of 1871. Peace will prevail and our fishermen will enjoy the advantages of the joint enterprises or ventures of fishing in those waters with as much security, as much peace, as much quiet, as they did the operation of the treaty of 1871. But the difference would be that by this treaty we should have secured the right by a treaty obligation, while in the treaty of 1871 our Republican friends left it to be begged or borrowed from the Canadians as they might see proper to grant in according to their grace and free will.

We should enjoy also the guaranties of this treaty without paying any money for it, or without paying free fish for it, or paying anything else for it. If the treaty is carried into effect it will produce precisely the same condition of peaceful intercourse that occurred under the treaty of 1871, which made no provision except to gratify the Canadians and keep them in good humor, and prevent them in that way from interfering with our rights.

It is a common notion frequently advanced in debate that the treaties of 1854 and 1871 were intended to be temporary arrangements. If they were so intended, they were disgraceful escapes from the questions and troubles engendered by the treaty of 1818, which the present Administration has met boldly and settled fairly on principle.

But they were intended to be permanent arrangements, unless they proved injurious to the one or the other of the treaty powers. The reciprocity treaty of 1854 went down under a prejudice against Canada that grew up during the war of the rebellion. The treaty of 1871 went down, as to the fisheries articles, because we found that the treaty was costing us in money many times more than the value of the privileges of the inshore fisheries.

It is yet a very serious question whether we have not lost greatly by the abrogation of the treaty of 1854. Thus we see that the treaty before the Senate is the first and only one in which any commercial privileges have been secured to our fishermen, or in which a serious effort has been made to secure them. I will go into this subject more fully when I shall attempt hereafter to discuss the merits of this treaty in open executive session.

It is in reference to the commercial privileges of our fishermen, and alone in reference to these alleged rights, that the startling doctrine is asserted, and the rash attitude is taken in the report of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations that the fisheries are no longer a proper subject of negotiation, and that the time for negotiation with Great Britain has passed.

What commercial privileges do we thus demand for our fishermen? The answer seems to be "the same that we accord to Canadian fishermen." The answer is not candid, for we do not accord to Canadians the right to take fish anywhere within 3 miles of our seacoast or to land and dry fish on any of our shores, and especially do we not allow them the liberty to fish within 3 miles of the shores of the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of the dominions or domain of the United States. They have no such treaty rights, and we have never granted such fishing rights to them by any statute, whether the bays are 6 miles wide or as wide as Boston Harbor, or Long Island Sound, or Delaware Bay, or Chesapeake Bay.

They have only the same commercial rights in our ports that we extend to all ships of commerce, while we have a treaty right for fishing privileges and to enter their bays, etc., for shelter or repairs and to obtain wood and water.

One thing is certain in respect of the commercial rights of Canadian fishermen in our ports of entry, and that is, that they are admitted, not for the sake of comity and as an act of grace and hospitality, but because their presence in our ports increases the trade of our merchants, mechanics, outfitters, and dealers in fishing-tackle, provisions, and the equipment of fishermen. Our people have many things to sell to Canadian fishermen in exchange for their fares, while the Canadians have little to sell to us besides bait and fish. We want their trade, while a narrow policy, as I think, induces them to reject the trade of our fishermen. The retaliation that would exclude their trade from our ports would lessen our profits much more than theirs.

But this is what we are told we must demand until their ports are as free to our fishermen as ours are to them.

All such demands are entirely apart from the treaty of 1818, and so we are distinctly informed in the report of the majority of the committee. But they insist that these demands shall be made and enforced by retaliation. If we succeed in getting what we require by this species of force, how long will the privilege continue if it is not secured by a treaty engagement? The answer is, that this having been accomplished by pressure, when that is removed the privilege will cease. I can think of nothing more hopeless as a permanent adjustment of our troubles than this temporary and uncertain expedient.

But it is this wild and unstable device that so strongly addresses itself to the judgment of Senators, that for fear it may not be resorted to they demand that no negotiation shall be entered upon with reference to the fisheries troubles. It is for the vague hope of advantage from this expedient that the President is censured for attempting to treat with Great Britain and to secure broad and useful privileges for our fishermen in a form where we can enforce them.

An untried experiment which all nations consider as leading in the first steps to be taken to the very verge of war, and is therefore resorted to only when all reasonably hope of agreement is extinguished, is held up as our only means of securing our full and just rights with reference to commercial advantages for our fishermen, about which we have not even proposed to treat with Great Britain.

In the summing up of our contentions under the treaty of 1818 as to its proper interpretation our Government instructed its commissioners in the joint high commission that made the treaty of 1871 as to the remedies they would provide for the injuries our fishermen had sustained. I will read them.

8.—REMEDIES.

These are the instructions to our negotiators who negotiated the treaty of 1871. Here are the remedies:

It is suggested that this class of questions may be adjusted, either—
I. By agreeing upon the terms upon which the whole of the reserved fishing-grounds may be thrown open to American fishermen, which might be accompanied with a repeal of the obnoxious laws, and the abrogation of the disputed reservation as to ports, harbors, etc.—

No commercial privileges yet mentioned—or, failing that—

II. By agreeing upon the construction of the disputed renunciation—

Mr. Bayard had attempted to agree upon the construction of the disputed renunciation. So he follows Mr. Fish's instructions upon that point—upon the principles upon which a line should be run by a joint commission to exhibit the territory from which the American fishermen are to be excluded—

Mr. Bayard did that also—and by repealing the obnoxious laws, and agreeing upon the measures to be taken for enforcing the colonial rights, the penalties to be inflicted for a forfeiture of the same, and a mixed tribunal to enforce the same.

Mr. Bayard proposed all that, and succeeded in all of it, too, except in the mixed tribunal.

It may also be well to consider whether it should be further agreed that the fish taken in the waters open to both nations shall be admitted free of duty into the United States and the British North American colonies.

Yet the gentleman who works the political end of the Republican party on the other side, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], got up to-day and charged the Democratic party with desiring to admit fish free and to have all manner of free trade with Canada. Here in the instructions given by Mr. Fish to the negotiators in 1871 he directs them to propose to Great Britain free fish and fish-oil to be admitted into both countries.

In addition to the authorities hereinbefore cited, there is in the archives of the Department of State a copious and well-arranged memoir upon the subject of the fisheries, by Richard D. Cutts, esq., of the Coast Survey, which will be placed at the disposal of the commissioners.

That concluded the instructions on the subject of the fisheries.

Mr. GEORGE. Has that memoir been printed?

Mr. MORGAN. It has been printed in parts. Extracts have been printed. The larger part of it is in manuscript in the State Department.

Nothing is suggested here as to commercial rights, nothing as to retaliation. All is to be accomplished by agreement under the compensatory and reciprocal inducement of admitting fish to both countries free of duty. This was our Republican plan of 1871. Our fishermen will not fail to contrast it with the plan of 1888, greatly to the advantage of the latter.

But I do not propose to discuss the merits of this treaty on these resolutions. They relate to the question whether this is a proper subject for negotiation; whether the time for negotiation has passed, and whether this treaty has been negotiated by persons duly and constitutionally empowered to conduct a negotiation.

The opinions of the Senate and of Congress and of individual Senators expressed in debate, have been referred to by the majority of the Committee of Foreign Relations to support their report on this treaty and to justify Senators in denouncing other Senators for alleged abandonment of their convictions under the lash of party discipline and under the pressure of Presidential influence.

I accord to other Senators what I claim for myself, that in their earlier discussions of these questions, and before a party caucus compelled the majority to conduct their part of these negotiations in the presence and hearing of all the people of the world who choose to listen, there was a reserve in statement and argument which was creditable to the Senate and was then compelled by the rules of this body.

The state of opinion in the Senate at the time when the President was anxiously investigating the best means of composing our fisheries troubles with Great Britain must have been an important fact to influence the line of policy he was to pursue. For however valuable our views may be, or however little worth they are intrinsically, they are the opinions of men whom he is bound to consult, of negotiators who may amend, reverse, or ratify his negotiations, or who may scout his action as being without authority.

The following resolution was offered in the Senate by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] February 24, 1887:

Resolved, That it is the judgment of the Senate that under present circumstances no negotiation should be undertaken with Great Britain in regard to existing difficulties with her province of Canada which has for its object the reduction, change, or abolition of any of our existing duties on imports.

That Senator must have forgotten, when he wrote that resolution, that fresh fish had been made free by his own party.

The Senator's mind grasped the fact that it would be proper, and was necessary "in regard to existing difficulties with her province of Canada" that "negotiation should be undertaken with Great Britain." He sought to prevent any "reduction, change, or abolition of any of our existing duties on imports" by means of such negotiation. The negotiation he then looked forward to has been had, and Mr. Bayard has steadfastly refused to make any change, or to attempt to make any increase, reduction, or abolition of duties on any imports in this treaty. The Senator had seen fresh fish put upon the free-list in a Republican Congress in 1870, and in the Republican treaty of 1871, and he feared a much larger addition to the free-list by a Democratic President.

If anything could induce that Senator to entertain, for one moment, a reasonably tolerant opinion of the President and Secretary of State, I would hope that the close and literal compliance, in this negotiation, with the expressed opinions of the Senator, in excluding from this negotiation all manner of interference with the tariff on fish or any other features of our tariff laws, would incline that Senator to a more indulgent view of the motives that influenced this treaty and the wisdom that guided in its negotiation. On the 3d of March, 1887, the Senate adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the appointment of a commission, in which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be represented, charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the two Governments on the coasts of the United States and British North America—

That included both coasts, you see—ought not to be provided for by Congress.

This resolution took the place of all other resolutions on this subject. It raised the question whether Congress should create, by law, a commission—

To be charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the two Governments on the coasts of the United States and British North America—or whether the Constitution should be observed in its control of such questions, by placing that control in the hands of the President and the Senate. It was in the debate on this resolution that some opinions were expressed that will show how rapidly and how curiously we have traveled to reach the ground now solemnly assumed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, that the fisheries are not proper subjects for negotiation with Great Britain, and that the time fo such negotiation has passed. I supposed then, as we all know now, that whenever the treaty of 1818 is improved it must be done by treaty.

If we retaliate upon British commerce until we have punished them into the full acceptance of our construction of that treaty and superadd the privileges of free commerce and trade to our fishermen, we could not be content to have all these valuable results to be again disputed when changes in the administration of the Canadian or British Government might cause these concessions to be withdrawn or modified. The time for treaty making will have then arrived instead of having been long passed. And so, if in this game of battledore and shuttlecock in which our most vital interests are to aid the sport of our most reckless statesmen, there should grow up such excitement and ill-blood that war should supervene; at the close of the contest the time for negotiation will again arrive. It is idle under any circumstances, except in impending war when we intend to strike the blow, to declare that the time for negotiation has passed. Unless we mean to resort to force, such vain fulminations only convince mankind that we are a nation of braggarts.

Pressure is right when we wish to get a reluctant power to settle our disputes with them by treaty, but when it is employed to prevent negotiation it can only mean a resort to force. I thought in 1887 that we were using the pressure of resolutions and laws to impress Great Britain with the necessity for treaty relations that were better understood and that should be more justly executed. True, none of us could then afford to say openly all that we believed or felt on these subjects. There were then, as now, some facts vitally affecting these questions that we could not even allude to. To-day, while we are here making a pretense before the country that we are discussing our relations with Great Britain openly and fully, there is laid upon the table of the Committee on Foreign Relations by a solid Republican vote the unpublished parts of two letters of Edward Everett, official letters, sent to our Government while he was minister to Great Britain, that would throw a flood of light upon both the American and British contentions about the fisheries.

I asked the Senate in resolutions to remove the injunction of secresy from these letters, that I might let the people into all our secret sources of information. The Committee on Foreign Relations refused even to report the resolution back to the Senate, and we must argue this treaty openly upon facts that we do not choose to reveal to our own people, and can not, therefore, be permitted to state in the Senate.

So, I appreciate the reserve under which Senators have been compelled to debate the resolutions and bills relating to this subject, that we have been compelled to consider and discuss. I will not resort to the strategem, which I consider immeasurably mean, unworthy, and unjust, of holding a Senator who spoke on these subjects in 1887, to his responsibility for utterances in which he did not dare to expose the secret counsels of his colleagues, or even to state fully and frankly his own opinions, lest he might betray his country into some unfortunate attitude.

With this allowance to all concerned, I will proceed to read some things that were said in debate on this floor in the earlier stages of this present controversy. The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] had the floor. He said:

I call attention now, Mr. President, to the treaty of 1818, the provisions of which, I suppose, have been in force since the abrogation of the fishery clauses of the "treaty of Washington." In the negotiation of this England evinced neither magnanimity nor sentiment, and our commissioners neither sagacity nor courage. The times were not propitious for us. Waterloo had been fought; the allies had entered Paris; Napoleon had abdicated, and England was arrogant. We deliberately surrendered all of our fishery rights, and a blow was dealt that industry from which it has never recovered. By its terms England laid the foundation for ceaseless demands, and invited her colonies to the enactment of penal laws and the commission of outrages in their name which would disgrace any civilization.

That was done under the terms of the treaty:

I call attention to Article I: "and the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominion in America, not included within the above-mentioned limits"— with a proviso that our fishermen might enter these bays, etc., for shelter or to repair damage, to purchase wood and take water, but for no other purpose whatever. We reserved to ourselves only the commonest rights of hospitality and renounced all commercial privileges whatsoever.

Adds the Senator—

We "renounced all commercial privileges whatsoever" by the treaty of 1818, says the Senator from Maine.

But, to be accurate, I ought not to say "renounced all commercial privileges," for up to that time, under England's peculiar colonial policy, we had enjoyed no such privileges.

Mr. COKE. May I ask the Senator who were the American commissioners in the negotiation of the treaty of 1818?

Mr. FRYE. I did know, but I have forgotten who they were.

In 1819 the English Parliament passed an act construing this article, making it an offense if our vessels had fished, were then fishing or preparing to fish, within the shore-line, and the colonial courts held that when a vessel within the shore-line was preparing to fish outside of it she was liable to seizure and condemnation.

Further, England claimed that this 3-mile line was to be measured outside of a line drawn from headland to headland, which would include gulfs half as large as the Gulf of Mexico. It is true that on the protest of our Government she subsequently instructed her officers not to enforce the law under this claim, but she has never renounced it.

In April, 188[illegible], the Senator from Maine said that England had never renounced that claim.

For several years we had but little trouble under this treaty; then it came in a perfect avalanche. England and her colony coveted our increasing market, and as usual, without a scruple, went for it. They seized vessel after vessel, condemned them in colonial courts on the testimony of colonial witnesses, refused them shelter, drove them to sea in storms, seized and searched on the high seas, broke up voyages, until in fact the perils of the sea on the banks were not greater than the dangers of the law within the shore-line. Our Government interfered again and again. Mr. Van Buren sent the Grampus into those waters in 1839; Mr. Pierce ordered a fleet there; the Kearsarge and the Mississippi cruised there, and in the presence of our armed vessels our fishermen were undisturbed, but immediately on their withdrawal the outrages were renewed.

The records of the Halifax Commission are full of evidences of illegal seizures; of seizures and condemnations on complaints of the most trivial and inconsequential character; of every conceivable outrage and wrong; of every violation of the rights of hospitality and friendly intercourse. In the pursuit of these unjustifiable methods England and her colony had but one purpose—to force open our markets, and in 1854 their efforts were crowned with success in the ratification of the so-called "reciprocity treaty," reciprocal, however, largely only in name. They opened their fisheries to us, and we our markets to them. I am confining myself, Mr. President, strictly to the question in issue, and, therefore, do not discuss the other features of that treaty.

There was a terrible list of outrages and wrongs, including every phase of what we contend is the misconstruction by Great Britain of the treaty of 1818, carried into actual effect by seizure of our ships, wrongs rated up, year by year. When Mr. Bayard came to treat on this subject he found all this mass of wrong and injustice, and he found that contention of the headlands in his front. It had been practiced long, and with perfect impunity, for no administration had resented it. The "grand old party" which was in possession of this Government for twenty-five years did not resent it all. It all went by as pleasantly as the dream of a sleeping maiden. All was agreeable among the ex-Secretaries and the great men who led the Republican party. They were all smooth and quiet. Notwithstanding that, the Senator from Maine was able in April, 1886, to get up in this body and utter this terrific denunciation against the conduct of Great Britain.

Mr. Bayard found it all there. What has he done with it? He has made a means by which it will not occur again. He has reserved these questions, one by one, that were not condoned and given up in the treaty of 1871 by the Republican party, for future adjudication, and they will be adjudicated, not waived, not condoned, not forgotten.

Now, you see how the situation is changed. You see what advice was given by one of these honorable negotiators, a man in high place, and deservedly so in the Senate for his ability and knowledge of the fisheries question. You see the advice he gave to the President of the United States, then, in his speech, and what the President had a right to conclude would meet his approbation, a treaty that would settle forever the headland theory, still contended for by Great Britain, and one that would check and put down these misinterpretations and misconstructions.

The Senator from Maine went into particulars a little farther on in his speech. The honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] was seeking some information from him. This occurred between them:

Mr. GRAY. I thank the Senator for allowing me to call his attention to that, because it seems to me it was apropos to something he said about executive aggression interfering with the rights of the American fishermen.

Mr. FRYE. I referred, Mr. President, to the aggression of the treaty-making power. I was glad to notice in the Tribune that our consul-general at Halifax seemed to have been better informed than our Secretary of State at Washington.

Mr. GRAY. He seems to have taken the same view precisely as the Secretary of State, so far as anything I have seen from him is concerned.

Mr. FRYE. Did not the Senator notice the two dispatches, one sent in the morning and the other in the evening, which I read the other day?

Mr. GRAY. I did. I will not interrupt the Senator now to say what I think about those dispatches; but I think they are entirely consistent with the position taken by Consul-General Phelan.

Mr. FRYE. The worst outrage which they can commit is the very one which they contend there they have a right to commit, and that is to prevent our vessels from buying bait and ice. What other commercial privileges, let me ask the Senator from Delaware, do we want of Canada than to let our vessels buy bait and ice there? There is nothing else on earth we want to buy there.

That is a pretty strong statement coming from very high authority, from a gentleman reared upon the coast, almost at the Bay of Fundy. Said the Senator from Maine:

What other commercial privileges, let me ask the Senator from Delaware, do we want of Canada than to let our vessels buy bait and ice there? There is nothing else on earth we want to buy there.

Mr. GRAY. I was not talking about commercial privileges. I was talking about the activity of the consular agents.

Mr. FRYE. The consular agent seems to admit there that we can not buy bait and ice.

Mr. GRAY. He has not said anything about that, I think.

Mr. FRYE. That very statement made in the New York Tribune says so, that the Canadians can put men on board our vessels, if they stay there a month, and put them there to see to what? To see that we do not fish or buy bait. All on earth we want to buy there is bait and ice.

I should think if that was all we wanted there at that time we do not want much more there now.

Mr. TELLER. We do not get that; that is the trouble. We do not get the right to buy bait there.

Mr. MORGAN. You will get it if you ratify this treaty.

Mr. TELLER. We could get it under certain circumstances and conditions.

Mr. MORGAN. The conditions are not onerous, merely that a man will take out a license by which he identifies himself as a fisherman. That is all. He does not pay anything for it. That is all he would have to do, and he can buy all the bait and all the ice or anything else he wants there. That is secured by this treaty.

Mr. GEORGE. That is all the Senator from Maine said we wanted to buy there?

Mr. MORGAN. That was all. They have not anything else to sell, he said.

Mr. EVARTS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama consent to be interrupted?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EVARTS. What do fishermen want to buy there besides bait and ice?

Mr. MORGAN. I never was up there in my life. I suppose if they could find some chickens they would like to buy them, possibly some potatoes. I do not know what else.

Mr. EVARTS. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] was certainly right in saying that all our fishing vessels in the quality of fishing vessels had occasion to ask of hospitality and trade there was to be allowed to buy bait and ice.

Mr. MORGAN. They are allowed to buy those and all other supplies for voyages homeward or outward. They have nothing to do but merely to register their license, and they do not have to pay anything for that under the proposed treaty. Now I will follow the Senator from Maine a little further.

Mr. GEORGE. Before the Senator goes on I wish to ask him if he is reading a statement which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] made in the last Congress?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; made in April, 1886. The Senator from Maine then referred to the increase of Canada's export of fish to this country since 1871. In 1871 it was $84,742.59, in 1881 it was $2,559,312.52, and in 1884 it was $3,886,358.39. He proceeds:

I have not the official figures of the great lake fisheries, but am informed that they fairly participate in this gain. In fact, it is beyond dispute that the life of the Canadian fisheries depends largely upon the freedom of our markets. Now, sir, what advantages have accrued to us from the Washington treaty?

1. "Wood, water, and shelter." But we had those before, and now, too, under the treaty of 1818.

2. Of commercial privileges. None under the treaty.

3. The right to take fish within the 3-mile limit. What has this been worth to us? The right to take capelin and squid for bait would have been of value, but the moment we undertook to avail ourselves of it we found cables cut, nets destroyed, all manner of damage inflicted, and nothing else could have been expected. The people around those shores, living on the small bays and harbors, have only one resource upon which they can depend for money, the capture of capelin and squid for bait, to be sold to the fishermen. Men, women, and children engage in it with the hook and line. One of our vessels with its huge seine can sweep a little bay clean. Who can blame these people for defending to the bitter end their only source of supply, the sole barrier between them and starvation? Our fishermen speedily gave up this advantage under the treaty and have purchased their bait of these poor people at a cost of over $100,000 annually. The shore and gulf fisheries have been absolutely worthless.

In connection with the graphic, earnest, and sympathetic remarks of the Senator from Maine, which do great credit to his magnanimity and his generosity as a man, I desire to refer to the fact that there are some delimitations of bays here—Fortune Bay, the Bay of Miramichi, and a part of Chaleurs where the bays are 10 miles from shore to shore, and at that point there is a fixed delimitation in the treaty.

I do not know that I can account fully for all this fixed delimitation, but referring to the remarks I have just read from the Senator from Maine, which were antecedent to the treaty, if the President of the United States found nothing else to respond to but that touching appeal to his generosity and magnanimity which the Senator from Maine so earnestly presented in behalf of those poor people, it seems to me that would have been quite a sufficient influence to have shut those little bays off in which our fishing is of no advantage to us and in which when we had the right to fish there for capelin and other bait we refused to exercise it and would buy bait from those poor people at the cost of a hundred thousand dollars a year. That, it seems to me, addressing itself to the sense of humanity of a people like ours, rich in everything, with the abundance that Providence has bestowed upon us, would be rather a strong and persuasive argument.

Those poor people stretch their huts around the coast, and the incoming of foreign ships, or any ships indeed, unless they are under the control of local laws, would have a natural tendency to break up their little local fisheries, their weirs, and their nets, etc. More than that, sparse communities like those have a very weak hold upon the elements of municipal control sufficient to hold in check a fleet of many thousand fishermen when they have a right to go there, away from the responsibility of home.

If we had communities situated in the same manner I should say that I would dislike very much indeed to understand that any foreign power, British power or any other, had the right to go at will within a little land-locked bay, anchor their ships, sweep about with their seines, and take from the people there all their means of subsistence when it came in. I should dislike that, and I must sympathize and concur with the Senator from Maine when in speaking of these people he says that they—have only one resource upon which to depend for money, the capture of capelin and squid for bait, to be sold to the fishermen.

There is another reason for it. The United States have engaged with great success and have furnished a very excellent example to their neighboring and other governments upon the subject of the propagation of food fishes. I am informed by the reports of the fisheries of Canada that especially in the Bays of Chaleurs and Miramichi they have their national fish hatcheries established just as we have at Wood's Holl. I should say that it would be a very prudent thing not only for Canadian interests, but also for the interests of the people who consume food-fishes the world over, that these hatcheries should not be liable to intrusion.

I can see in that a very good reason why we might have found it to our advantage as well as to the advantage of the Canadians that fixed lines of delimitation should be put there so that our fishermen or the fishermen of any other country could not intrude.

I did not propose, however, to dwell upon that branch of the subject. I will look into it a little more closely and see if I can find out more about it. I will follow the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] a little further.

In speaking of the value of the inshore fisheries the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] said:

Carefully compiled statistics for the whole period of twelve years show an annual average of 96¾ vessels engaged in the gulf fisheries and within the shore-line. The average annual catch in the gulf was worth in our market $194,659; within the shore line, $64,882. That would give each vessel in the gulf, $2,010; in the shore-line, $673. Now, an American vessel in the gulf, to pay expenses of outfit, insurance, depreciation of vessel, crew's share, and master's commission, must take four thousand dollars' worth of mackerel. So that every mackerel taken either in the gulf or in the shore-line actually cost nearly twice what it was worth. During the whole twelve years our vessels took about seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars' worth, and they cost them more than $1,200,000. The statistics of the last half of the treaty period make a still worse showing. Formerly it was not unusual for us to have 500 mackerel vessels at a time in the gulf, but in 1879 we had 44; in 1880, 34; in 1881, 3; in 1882, 1.

W. A. Wilcox, of the United States Fish Commission, in his report for 1885, says:

"The few vessels that fished in the Gulf of St. Lawrence at times found mackerel very scarce, at times very plenty, but they were small and of poor quality. With the hopes of finding larger and better fish soon, the vessels in many cases forwarded their catch by rail or steamer to Boston or Gloucester, the same selling for $2.12½ to $3.50 per barrel, frequently not bringing enough to pay the cost of barrels, salt, freight, insurance, and commission, not mentioning time, labor, and expense of the voyage. The crews fishing on shares in many cases received nothing, and the vessels' expenses exceeded their gross receipts.

* * * * * * *

"On November 21 schooners Spencer F. Baird, William McDonald, and W. H. Jordan arrived at Gloucester from a six weeks' cruise in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and off the Nova Scotia shore, none of these vessels having caught a single mackerel during the entire trip.

"Vessels from Gloucester, Mass., are the only ones that entered provincial ports for the purpose of obtaining barrels and supplies. These purchased 9,572 empty fish-barrels, valued at $7,425.95, and paid in addition $9,759.05 for provisions, and $331.26 harbor dues."

It needs no argument outside of these figures to show that the right accorded us to fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and within the 3-mile shore-line is absolutely worthless.

I think the President of the United States in negotiating this treaty might have taken that as a veritable fact, coming from the Senator from Maine, who is an acknowledged authority upon this question, who really understands it as well as anybody, and who has the frankness always to speak what he thinks about everything. I remember that the Senator from Massachusetts insisted that the Senator from Maine ought to have been consulted as well as himself, and he said that the Senator from Maine would have made one of the very best of experts to have negotiated a treaty. If he had started out with the proposition, which is here stated, that the right accorded to us to fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the whole of that great gulf, 3 miles of that shore-line, is absolutely worthless, he probably would have felt no qualms whatever in giving it up. But we did not do it. The President of the United States did not go as far as the Senator from Maine invited him to go in his speech. Did any Senator here ever deny that proposition? There was no denial of it. It was the truth and could not be denied.

Mr. MORGAN. Is not the right to fish with bait worth something?
Mr. FRYE. Within the shore-line?
Mr. MORGAN. Yes.
Mr. FRYE. No, sir; it is not. How are you going to take your halibut?
Mr. MORGAN. I refer especially to mackerel.
Mr. FRYE. Mackerel fishing there I think is practically worthless to us; but halibut fish can be taken with bait. We wish to buy bait in Canada for that.
Mr. President, why is it that a privilege formerly of immense value has become valueless? Simply for the reason that there has been a radical change in the manner and methods of fishing, as suggested by the Senator from Alabama.

Now he accounts for it, states his sum, and adds it up, and then proves it.

Mr. GEORGE. There has been no change in the habits of the fish up there?

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all.

Mr. GEORGE. Simply a change in the method of catching them.

Mr. MORGAN. There has been a change in the method of catching them. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] continues:

The entire worthlessness to us of the privileges accorded by the Washington treaty, the gradual but certain destruction of our fishing industry, the alarming decrease of our fishing fleet and of the sailors manning it, were known of all men, and the earliest day it could, under the terms of the treaty, be done, I introduced a resolution into the Senate instructing the President to give notice of its abrogation as to the fishing clauses. The resolution was reported back from the Committee on Foreign Relations unanimously, and passed both Houses of Congress without dissent or division. July 1, 1885, should have released us from this bondage, but months before that long-desired day arrived our fishermen heard with amazement and indignation that Secretary Bayard was making, without the interposition of the Senate, a new treaty, extending certain provisions of the old one, with a new agreement that—

Now, I will call attention for a moment to the ideas of the Senator from Maine about Canada. He said:

The right of our fishermen to-day to buy bait and ice rests on precisely the same basis as the right to purchase any other article they have to sell; and should this right be denied, Congress can promptly and effectually retaliate by excluding British colonial shipping from our ports. In these regards our intercourse with these colonies depends entirely on legislation, not on treaties. There is not the slightest danger of Great Britain assenting to any interruption of these privileges, to any interference with this intercourse. Newfoundland, a few years since, passed a law prohibiting the sale of bait and ice to our fishermen, but Great Britain refused her assent to the legislation.

Mr. President, I assert, without fear of contradiction by any man engaged in the fishing business, I do not mean importer of fish, that we have nothing to ask of Canada. She has no control over, nor exclusive interest in, any waters where we desire to fish for cod, haddock, halibut, or mackerel. Then what is there for a commission to settle, so far as we are concerned? Canada, I admit, does seek something of us. Our market is to her an absolute necessity. But, under a recent ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury, that solidly-frozen halibut, frozen for weeks, brought into Gloucester by the vessel-load, were "fish fresh for immediate consumption," and not dutiable, a market is opened up to Canada for at least 600,000,000 pounds of fish annually.

The Republicans let in 600,000,000 pounds of fish annually from Canada without paying any duty at all. The Democrats had not anything to do with it except to sit by and see it done. The Senator from Maine continued:

I said we asked nothing of Canada, but we do demand of our Secretary of the Treasury that in construing our tariff laws, if he is in doubt, we and not Canada shall have the benefit of the doubt. Since that item was put into our tariff law the whole method of preserving fish fresh has changed. Then they must be consumed at once, or cured by salt or smoking, but now with freezing processes, refrigerators on fishing vessels, on steamers, on cars, and in every great market, fish are kept fresh as long as they are preserved good by curing. If the Secretary will wisely reconsider this decision, and find some way to rule that small herring, brought in fresh to-day, and to-morrow boiled in oil and made sardines, shall be admitted free of duty, his conclusions will be much more beneficent for his countrymen.

Mr. MORGAN. Can we not get the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to find out whether he is right or not?

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Vermont calls my attention to an act of 1823 which authorizes the President to issue proclamation at any time without any further enactment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When there is discrimination made against our vessels in British ports.

Mr. MORGAN. That is what I understood the law to be. It is not necessary to have any additional Congressional action about it. The President by proclamation can declare non-intercourse.

Because I made that statement at that early day, with the approbation of all the Senators around me, I have been held up as a very inconsistent sort of man in my opinion. I found myself lately very unexpectedly to be a very high authority, being quoted by every one of the Senators who spoke on the other side of this question as if I had a right to commit the Government of the United States to my personal opinion. I admit that I stand on better ground as authority than Mr. Woodbury, or Mr. Spofford, or Mr. Trescot. I concede that they are very much more learned men than I am, but they are and have been all the time employed as counsel in the case, paid a regular salary for their opinions; and these briefs of hired counsel are brought to the Senate of the United States, and it is announced that those gentlemen are all Democrats, and they want to show the Democratic party of the United States what a terrible mistake Senators are making in following Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Bayard, who are working for the good of the country instead of going to the briefs of the hired counsel, Mr. Woodbury, Mr. Trescot, and Mr. Spofford. I believe all three of those gentlemen were among the "five wise men of the East" whom we were advised by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to select to negotiate treaties.

The Senator from Maine was one of them. With the Senator from Maine denying that our rights inshore there were worth anything, denying that the privilege of catching bait was worth anything, as it was more emphatically denied in the report that he joined me in from the Committee on Foreign Relations a little subsequent to the debate from which I have been reading, if we had them altogether I do not know what sort of a medley we should have made of it. I doubt if we could agree at all. Still, I am sorry, after all, that Mr. Bayard did not increase his commission to eight, and bring in the five wise men and put them to work on this treaty. Perhaps that would have satisfied somebody.

It has been alleged, and very unjustly to me, that I have changed my position upon this question. I have read the resolution which was pending before the Senate, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in which the ground was taken that Congress had no right to provide a commission, because the Constitution of the United States had put it entirely within the power of the President to negotiate a treaty upon any question without the advice and assistance of Congress. But the ground was taken further by those who were willing to vote for the resolution in the language in which it was couched, that if Congress had the right to create the commission Congress must instruct the commission, and must ratify the action of the commission, and execute its action; and that that was a power which was entirely foreign to our constitutional system. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] said in the course of that debate:

Mr. FRYE. I thought that I accorded to the Secretary of State entire honesty of purpose in this matter. I complained that he did not give a hearing to the president of the Fishery Union. If he had, neither the President nor the Secretary of State would have fallen into this diplomatic trap which had been set for them here in Washington.

That is, by the celebrated negotiator, Sir Lionel Sackville West. The Senator from Maine continued:

Now, Mr. President, who seeks another commission?

This was in 1886:

In the light of the history I have sketched, of treaties with Great Britain touching our fishing interests, of the awards and judgments of commissioners having hitherto the consideration and settlement of differences between us and our Canadian neighbors, is there a single ray of encouragement for us to enter again upon this dangerous pathway? What have we to gain by it?

I declare that no man in the United States has asked for another commission, and that no man's name in the United States can be given who has sought another commission at the hands of the President or Secretary of State.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine what he means by another commission? Does he mean a commission like that which met at Halifax, or a commission like that which negotiated and settled the treaty of 1871?

Mr. FRYE. I mean precisely what the President says—a commission to consider and settle the fishery rights. I mean any commission.

Mr. MORGAN. Let me ask the Senator from Maine, so that we may understand each other, does he hold that it is the duty of the Government from this time forward to abstain from all effort to settle any disputed questions that may arise or have arisen on the construction of the treaties or the effect of the provincial or British laws upon this subject of the fisheries? Does he intend to close the door against all future negotiations and leave the matter standing precisely as it is, without any effort on the part of the Government of the United States either to correct it or to participate in bringing the two governments to a common understanding as to what the rights of our people are?

Mr. FRYE. I have no power, and if I had I do not know that I would exercise it, to prevent negotiations being made for a treaty touching Canada and her trade and our trade through the usual and ordinary channels, where it would take a two-thirds vote of the United States Senate to ratify any treaty so made.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, I concur with the Senator from Maine that whatever questions remain unsettled between these two governments ought to be settled in the ordinary channels of diplomacy, and ought to be settled ultimately by a two-thirds vote of the Senate upon a treaty submitted to them. I agree to that, but I do not think that it is exactly fair to characterize the suggestion of the President that we should act through a commission as being one entirely parallel with or at all akin to that unfortunate misadventure of our commission which settled the Halifax difficulty in a manner so extremely distasteful to us. I do not understand the President in his recommendation to propose a commission which shall by its action in advance conclude all questions between the governments as to the fisheries, but that it is to negotiate; and I concur with the Senator from Maine that the proper functionaries of the United States Government to negotiate treaties are specified in the Constitution of the country, and they are the diplomatic agents, whoever they may be, authorized by law and empowered by the appointment of the President and the confirmation of the Senate to act in the matter of negotiations, and then the Senate of the United States has the power to ratify or to reject their action.

I do not hold to the doctrine, nor do I understand that the President holds to it in his message, that the Congress of the United States by a mere enactment can empower commissioners to negotiate unsettled diplomatic questions between these two countries in such a way as that their conclusions will become binding upon the country, although the Senate may never have anything to say about the matter in the ratification of the result of their work.

Mr. FRYE. Then the language of the President of the United States was exceedingly unfortunate in his message; and the Senate will bear me witness that I have as yet said nothing touching a reciprocal treaty. I have entered as yet no objection to the treaty-making power negotiating, because I regard the protection of the two-thirds vote in the Senate as ample.

So the Senator from Maine and myself occupied the same ground. Will those honorable Senators who have accused me of abandoning diplomacy in favor of a resolution of retaliation do themselves the justice to appear in the light of honest, sincere truth before the world by correcting their statement? I do not know whether they will and I do not care; it is for them to say.

I wish to show what I had to say in the same year about the then state of the question. In a colloquy which occurred between the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and myself, I replied to one of his suggestions, which I need not read, as follows:

Mr. MORGAN. Unquestionably we can do that. Our men in going there do not go under the license of the treaty of 1818; they go under the license of the British statute, and if the statute is in existence at the time they go there we should not hesitate to resent any wrong done to our people, any of them, for the performance of any innocent act, innocent at the time. What might be the result of it after we had had our controversy, I do not know. We might be forced back to the treaty of 1818, because they might repeal their laws and we repeal ours and thereby proclaim again non-intercourse between the British provinces and the United States. That might be the result of it. But all this is now answering a beneficial purpose. It shows the impolicy—

That is the point to which I want to call attention—

It shows the impolicy of discussing any question of this kind as a mere problem, not upon an existing state of facts, not upon an issue made up between us and Great Britain, but upon a supposititious state of facts, conjectural entirely, and so far as I can understand this whole business we are dealing from beginning to end with it as a conjectural matter, and not something that actually exists, and not something that actually claims the attention of the Government, at least this branch of it.

Now notice the embarrassment here in speaking about what we should do in a certain case. Here are Senators who have to vote upon all the treaty relations that become laws between this and other countries; here we are debating a question that is not up upon a state of facts that is only imaginary, and we are quoting very gravely propositions of law and tracing out their analogies and their history, and we are saying also in this state of the case, "I would do thus and so," and some other Senator says, "In this state of case I would do thus and so." All this debate has been brought before the Senate of the United States by what I conceive to be a mistaken call upon the Congress of the United States for its assistance in conducting this matter.

The Congress of the United States has no assistance to grant in this case, and ought not to be called upon to grant it. If we were settling the issues of a war, as we were in 1871, and if we were settling questions of damages that were still open between ourselves and foreign countries growing out of alleged breaches of treaty obligations, then it might become necessary for Congress, in order, perhaps, to give emphasis or some direction, or make some ancillary provision of law, to indulge in anticipation for the pupose of creating a great commission to go out and settle the question. Nevertheless when we came to settle that most important question that we have ever had since the war of 1812, the question of the Alabama claims, connected with which, by British ingenuity, was some almost indefinite claim in respect of the breach of the fisheries treaty, we did not come to the Congress of the United States and ask them to enact a law creating a great high commission. There were ten commissioners who negotiated the treaty of Washington, five on a side, but there was no statute and no joint resolution authorizing the making of that great commission.

I then went on to discuss the subject of the duty of Congress to create a commission for the purpose of considering the fisheries question.

Mr. GRAY. I will ask the Senator from Alabama if the passages he has read occurred in the same debate in 1886?

Mr. MORGAN. They are found in the same debate, which the Senator has noticed here time and again sent around in hand-bill form to inform the people of the United States of my opinions, keeping out of view the whole pith and substance of my statement. It is bad enough for a Senator of the United States to be compelled to refer in this open manner to anything that he has to do as a negotiator for his country in the execution of these very delicate duties. It is bad enough, as we all know, that under the embarrassment of his apprehension that he will say something which might betray his country into a difficulty, he has to bear these burdens and undergo and encounter these difficulties; but when he does and says all that he can to put himself right in regard to the duty of the President to negotiate instead of a commission to be created by Congress, and in regard to the duty of the President to negotiate in preference to retaliation—it is very hard to have his colleagues on this floor get up and select passages from his speeches which do not represent him fairly and truly.

I would beg pardon of the Senate for these allusions to myself were it not that they have been harped upon so frequently and so laboriously by Senators. They certainly must have had very poor material for argumentation when they had to drop the treaty and take me up.

But there is one Senator on this floor to whose remarks I desire to call attention. He generally states them concisely and perspicuously and in most admirable style. In 1887, on the retaliation bill, he seemed to anticipate what might happen hereafter about it, and so he made the speech from which I shall read. It is due to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that I should lay his speech in considerable part before the Senate. He said, January 24, 1887:

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it goes without saying that if the rights of the humblest citizen of the United States should be attacked by any foreign power there would exist a unanimity of sentiment on the part of the people of the United States that those rights should be protected, that the glory and honor of the American people must be preserved. As the Senator from Alabama in front of me [Mr. MORGAN] has very well said, there would be no geographical or sectional differences if any such issue were ever made, and it would be found that the men who were arrayed against each other in battle very lately would stand together in solid phalanx in defense of these rights and of this honor. All this talk which runs beneath any such thing as a war with other peoples of the world is premature. It is enough for us to meet any such contingency when it is absolutely impossible to avoid it.

As for myself, I can say that I have no such prejudice in favor of England or her institutions as prevents me now from declaring that I would not hesitate one single instant as to the consequences if the issue of individual rights or national honor should be presented to this Congress. But it becomes us to consider well every step that we take in regard to this most serious complication. Whatever else may be said about England and her people, they have in their veins the same blood of conquest and aggression that runs through our own veins; and when it comes to a question of right and of English honor, I am not afraid to say, in spite of any misconception or prejudice in this country against England, that no people that ever lived in history have been more valiant or would suffer more to defend their rights or their national honor.

The Senator from Missouri had read a statement from Mr. Phelps in some of his correspondence, and he remarked upon it as follows:

I have read this for a double purpose; to show the real points at issue, which it seems to me to have not been sufficiently set forth in the course of this discussion, and in the second place, to show that our representative abroad has been true to his country and has asserted the full measure of the rights of the American people, and not only individual rights but our national honor. The negotiations are still pending, as we are informed by the Secretary of State, with the hope that they may come to a favorable adjustment.

Negotiations were pending.

This measure now comes to us, for which I expect to vote, in the nature of a proposition for a commercial embargo. It is, if not war, the half-sister of war. We know in the history of this country war was the result of the embargo which cast its shadow over the last years of Mr. Jefferson's administration, and upon which he vainly relied to prevent a war with Great Britain. That embargo ruined our own people, and the war of 1812 burst upon the country with a British army that ravaged our borders as the vessels of Great Britain ravaged our commerce upon the seas.

This power in this bill is the most extraordinary declaration of war known to civilized nations, and this bill contains most extraordinary phrases, the meaning of which I do not pretend to give. It is said here that the President of the United States shall do so and so, that it shall be his duty within his discretion to declare this embargo against commerce; it shall be his duty within his discretion. What is meant by that "discretion" I leave to the able Senator from Vermont in charge of this bill. If the President has "discretion" why point out his "duty?" If we say to him it is his "duty," why give to him the "discretion?" It is "his duty within his discretion" to put this embargo upon the commerce of the United States with this foreign nation.

But that is not all. I stated that I should vote for the bill, and I vote for it, I am frank to say, because it contains the single provision that the President of the United States shall have discretion in regard to this matter. I would not vote for it as a mandatory bill. I would not take the responsibility of saying that the President of the United States should declare this embargo when these negotiations are still pending and when we know the full result of what a war with Great Britain must mean. It is well enough to talk in a rhetorical style about a war with Great Britain. The world in arms can not conquer this country upon our own soil—nor five such worlds in arms, it may be said without exaggeration. The United States united are invincible in any such struggle as that. But in a maritime war, who could answer for the result? Who wants to risk the gage of battle in any such fashion as that? Who wants to invite such a contest, no matter how high his patriotism or what his military ardor? Who can think for one minute of the enormous loss, not only of life, but of property, which must follow from any such struggle, situated as we now are?

No Senator on this floor attempted to correct that construction put by the Senator from Missouri upon that act of 1887, which is now called a law of retaliation, and which the majority of the committee insist is obligatory upon the President, and that he has no right to decline to execute it or to resort to his constitutional treaty-making power in advance of an attempt to execute it. It is right there, Mr. President, that this committee undertakes, by an act outside of this treaty, and that has nothing to do with its merits, to put this country in an attitude where the President of the United States is bound to resort to retaliation, because they not merely reject the treaty which he has made, but they say in terms, and time and again it has been quoted in debate here, which I will include in my remarks, though I shall not stop just now to read it, that the time for negotiation has passed with Great Britain, and that this is not a fit subject of negotiation. I should like to know what right the Senate of the United States or any of its committees has to say that.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask the Senator if he refers to the committee's report?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. EVARTS. Will the Senator allow me to ask what portion of that report he refers to. Is it the clauses contained on page 34?

Mr. MORGAN. I will state to the Senator that the portions to which I refer are contained on pages 24, 25, and 34 of the report of the majority. I will read the portions.

Mr. EVARTS. I did not intend to put the Senator to the inconvenience of reading. I only wanted a reference to the portions to which he referred.

Mr. MORGAN. On pages 24, 25, and 34 of the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. EVARTS. I found the extract on page 34. Those clauses I recognized.

Mr. MORGAN. On pages 24 and 25 the Senators will find the others.

Mr. President, why did this committee see proper, in rejecting this treaty, to make that demand upon the Senate, so that if their action in reporting that the treaty be rejected should be ratified by a majority of this body, we should stand committed to the declaration that the President had violated his duty in disobeying what they considered to be and announced to be a final injunction of Congress that this subject should hereafter be one of retaliation and not of negotiation.

I call that an act of outrageous presumption on the part of that great committee—a dangerous act of outrageous presumption. We have no more right to instruct the President of the United States that he shall cease negotiations than we have a right to require him to resign his office, not a bit; and whenever in the course of affairs his judgment recommends to him the exercise of the treaty-making power, it is his right and his duty to exercise it, and send his work here for ratification or rejection or amendment by the Senate.

After doing that, this committee, with a stiff presumption, an unaccountable affectation of authority and dignity, set themselves up to advise the British Crown. We beg your Majesty that you will not take this abortion that the President of the United States has negotiated with your commissioners and its rejection as being an evidence on the part of the United States of a hostile purpose—that is the idea—but that you will provide in such a way as that our fishermen shall have full commercial privileges and enjoy the same rights and advantages in your Canadian ports that your fishermen enjoy in ours. To say nothing of the presumption of it, look at the humiliation of it, begging the British Queen for grace and favor after you have rejected a treaty here upon the ground that she is no longer entitled to have a negotiation offered her.

Our offense, as you will please to understand it, is not against your royal Majesty at all or your Government; it is against Grover Cleveland. We want to give him a wipe as we go along, and a very serious one, and having done that by denouncing him as a presumptuous negotiator of a treaty, in the face of our resolution and in the face of our law giving him the privilege of deciding it and making it his duty to decide whether the United States has reason or not for retaliation, we have flattened him out, and now we turn to your Majesty to assure you very humbly that we did not mean any offense towards you! That is the meaning of it. I should like to see an Irishman with a mouth big enough to gulp that thing down!

This little political finesse, this attempt to cast odium and slur upon the President of the United States, and then to turn around to the Queen of Great Britain and beg of her to escape the consequences, is one of the most humiliating attitudes that a great committee ever took; it is regular toadyism to the British power. I do not think a record of that sort was ever made before, and I challenge the gentlemen who follow me to explain what they meant about it, and why they put that address to the British Crown in the conclusion of their report. I have it here, and I will read it.

Mr. GEORGE. Let us have it.

Mr. MORGAN. It is as follows:

The committee can not but hope that if these ill-advised negotiations, which, as is known to all the world, can not properly commit the United States in any degree until they shall have received the constitutional assent of the Senate, shall fail to meet the approval of this body, Her Majesty's Government will take measures to secure justice and fair treatment in her North American dominions to American vessels and American citizens, in all respects and under all circumstances, and that that Government will see the justice and propriety of according to American vessels engaged in the business of fishing all the commercial rights and facilities in her North American ports that are so freely and cheerfully accorded to her own in the ports of the United States, and that thus the friendship and good feeling which ought to exist between neighboring nations may be finally established and secured.

We would expect to see that signed by the Secretary of State, but instead of that it is signed "JOHN SHERMAN, GEO. F. EDMUNDS, WM. P. FRYE, WM. M. EVARTS, J. N. DOLPH," Senators. So mote it be, Amen. They ought to have wound up with the doxology. What is the use of posing after such a statement as that? Is that taking the British side of the question when they bow the knee of humility before the Queen of Great Britain and put up a prayer to save them against the President of the United States, or is it taking the American side?

Mr. EVARTS. Does the Senator think that the expression of a great nation towards another great nation that that nation would do justice is a petition? That is all we have said.

Mr. MORGAN. The difficulty in the case is that five Senators of the committee are not a great nation. If the Senator from New York really feels that he and his colleagues in the majority are a great nation, that is all right; but so far from being a great nation, they are mere Senators.

Mr. EVARTS. It was expressed in the name of the American nation.

Mr. MORGAN. What right had you to do it? How do you represent the American people in diplomacy?

Mr. EVARTS. Oh, you can comment upon it as much as you please, but that does not alter the case.

Mr. MORGAN. What right has the Senator or any body of Senators to represent the American people in diplomacy? The Constitution gives us no such function. It is an arrogant act of presumptuous impertinence to do it, and that is the whole of it.

Mr. EVARTS. What I object to is the alteration of the text.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not misquote the text.

Mr. EVARTS. A petition you expressed it.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, what else is it?

The committee can but hope that your Majesty's Government will take measures—

They do not say "pray," but they might as well have said it, for that is what it means.

Mr. EVARTS. I thought the Senator denounced it as "arrogant presumption."

Mr. MORGAN. I did denounce it as arrogant presumption. The Committee on Military Affairs, or the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, had just as much right to make a recommendation to Great Britain as the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Constitution of the United States fixes our functions here, and in so far as we are concerned with this treaty we have nothing to do with it, unless it be to amend, to ratify, or to reject it. That is all we can do; and that ought to be done under the curtain of secrecy, where nobody could distinguish one Senator from another in his action on the matter. It ought not to be the action of a political majority, born in a political caucus, as this was.

Now, I pass over to the next question in this case, to which I will make a very brief reference. It is alleged in this report very gingerly, in quite a tentative and easy way, that the President of the United States had no right to appoint these negotiators. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] came to the conclusion that he had the right to appoint one, so he fixed up an amendment, or rather he put in a resolution, which denied the right to appoint Messrs. Putnam and Angell, but admitted the right of the President to appoint Mr. Bayard. If there was one negotiator there that was a good negotiation, there is no right to make any complaint of it.

But I wish to show now a case in point. When we met to negotiate the treaty of 1871, the broad subject of entering upon a negotiation was brought to the attention of the Senate by the President. I suppose that nobody will say that General Grant was a weak man or that he did not have self-respect or that he was afraid of the opinions or other people. He laid before the Senate what he thought was a proper subject for their consideration, the subject of a general treaty with Great Britain. He appointed the negotiators by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and they went on until they negotiated a treaty; that is to say, they conducted the negotiation to something where it was about to reach a conclusion, and thereupon General Grant, without consulting the Senate, appointed the negotiators to negotiate the great treaty of 1871.

Why did he apply in the first instance to the Senate on the subject of conducting such a negotiation, and why did he in the second instance speak of his own power and act upon his own power in the appointment of the negotiators to the office they held? It was because in the first instance it was a subject of great public policy that he wished to have considered by the Senate of the United States, and he took their advice on the broad question of public policy, and the commissioners were appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. That was the joint high commission. They did not sign the treaty.

When the President of the United States came to embody that treaty as it was formulated in a paper, a document, and send it to the Senate of the United States, he issued under his own hand his own authority to the negotiators, without referring it to the Senate, showing that the President of the United States had in that case a most thorough and complete conception of what were his constitutional powers in the appointment of negotiators, the employment of men to represent him in a matter of negotiation, and showing also that when he wished the advice and consent of the Senate on a broad subject of general national policy he thought it was his right, his privilege, and his duty to invite the attention of the Senate to it. I have the commissions here. It is not necessary to read them, but they run just exactly as I have stated.

That, with a number of cases in which the Senate has not been consulted, it would seem, would be quite sufficient to establish the proposition that Mr. Cleveland had the right to appoint negotiators to negotiate this treaty; but at the very outside it can not be denied that Mr. Bayard was a competent negotiator; and if he was, the President was clearly within the line of his constitutional duty.

I was a little surprised at the making of that question and very much gratified that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] did not seem to attach the slightest importance to it in committee, although that Senator always stands by his party and votes with it every time it calls upon him, I believe. I am very sorry the party has not been more considerate in rewarding that honorable Senator for his great devotion to its interests. I think they ought to have done it. It turns out in this day and time that almost "any fellow" can get a place if he just happens to be in the right part of the roof when the lightning strikes.

Before I close upon this subject of the act of 1887, I want to call attention to a joint resolution which was reported yesterday from the Committee on Foreign Relations by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], which reads thus:

> That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to take such measures as in his judgment may be necessary to promptly obtain indemnity from the Venezuelan Government for the injuries, losses, and damages suffered by the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company of New York, and its officers, by reason of the wrongful seizure, detention, and employment, in war or otherwise, of the said company's steamers Hero, San Fernando, and Nutrias by Venezuelan belligerents in the year 1871, and to secure this end he is authorized to employ such means or exercise such power as may be necessary.

Mr. GIBSON. In connection with this question has the Senator from Alabama given any consideration to the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], by which all disputes between our own and foreign governments were to be referred to arbitration, which was recently adopted by the Senate?

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Louisiana, that that was done during the campaign; that was before the Chicago nomination, and I did not care about referring particularly to it. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, suppose the Congress of the United States, having all these great controversies and these great amounts of damages, these quarrels and disputes about the fisheries, when they came to pass the act of 1887 had put in the concluding words that are in this joint resolution, then there might have been some reason for saying to the President, "You have not followed our advice and you have not made war, you have not used the forces of the United States for the purpose of collecting our demands against the British Government or enforcing our rights;" but when we come to a poor little country like Venezuela, we have not any difficulty of that sort. Why? Because we know she can not help herself. A mere threat against a small power is enough, and the President of the United States would be derelict in his duty in this case, if Venezuela did not pay up on his demand, if he did not send some of our rotten hulks down there and fire a few guns against Laguayra or some other place in Venezuela; but when you come to Great Britain, the British lion, whose tail you so industriously twist just now, you are very particular not to say anything at all that would lead the Government of Great Britain to suppose that you really meant war, and yet you do, and you complain of the President because he has not made it.

This is the sum and substance of this case. Will it do to say "We do not expect war; it will not come; it will not be one of the fruits of this line of procedure?" Will it do to say that? Why, Mr. President, I fear not. War may not occur. Why should it not? One thing I will say to the Senate, and they know that I speak the truth. If Great Britain had passed an act of this kind against us and undertook to enforce it, she would feel our claws. A Democratic administration—whatever might be done by a trafficking Republican administration—would plant itself by the rights of the country and would say to Great Britain, "That means a threat against us of war, and we intend to meet it with efficient means and overcome what you may attempt to do."

What is the use of trumpeting these high-sounding belligerent phrases and resorting to these measures that are scarcely less than war if you not mean anything but a trade and traffic?

The people of the United States, Mr. President, may find sooner than we expect that there is at least a rumor, an apprehension, a prospect of belligerency in this country, and that is enough to shake a great many men to the dust. Our commercial interests of the most important character and in all parts of this country are poised upon very narrow centers. The least little disturbance of the financial condition of the country often shakes them to a fall, and here with our money locked up in the Treasury and no relief from taxation, with the country apprehending bankruptcy continually because of the congestion of money here and its scarcity in the places where it ought to have free circulation, what is to prevent a sudden contraction of the currency, a hoarding of money as in war times? What does it mean to hold out to the people of the United States the prospect even that in consequence of these difficulties there may be belligerency between the United States and Great Britain?

You can not name two nations on this earth that would inflict upon each other such damages, such losses, such terrible slaughter as would occur if we should engage in a war with Great Britain. God only knows what the outcome of it would be. It might be that Canada would swing into our possession, and that we should have hitched on to us a hostile and dissatisfied people that perhaps might otherwise have come into a condition of friendliness towards us, when we could assimilate them into our great body politic. All this is because it is supposed for party purposes a few votes can be had for the Republican party by conducting this treaty matter in this way.

Senators on the Democratic side, let me say to you that I believe the American people have better sense and better conscience than to be controlled by considerations of this kind. Let us do our duty to this treaty and to our country in the calamities which its rejection shall bring upon it, let us stand by our country through thick and thin, then whatever may happen the responsibility will be upon that side of the Chamber and upon that caucus that was held out here in a room, and not upon us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. TELLER. I desire to submit a few remarks, but I do not care about going on at this late hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Colorado does not wish to go on now, I should like to ask unanimous consent to consider a bill.

Mr. TELLER. I will go on, of course, if it is desired by the Senate; but I suppose we shall adjourn in half an hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to pass a little bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is entitled to the floor on the pending question.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator says he would prefer not to proceed with his remarks to-night.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate being now in legislative session, the Chair lays before the Senate the executive certificate of the election of honorable JONATHAN CHACE as Senator from the State of Rhode Island for six years from the 4th of March, 1889, which will be read and placed on file.

The credentials were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

By his excellency Royal C. Taft, governor, captain-general, and commander-in-chief of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations:

Be it known that JONATHAN CHACE, of Lincoln, in the State aforesaid, qualified according to the Constitution of the United States for a Senator in the Congress thereof, was, by the Legislature of said State in conformity with law, on the 13th day of June, A. D. 1888, elected a Senator from said State in the Congress of the United States for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1889.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of said State to be affixed at Providence this 7th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1888, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirteenth.

ROYAL C. TAFT.

By his excellency the governor.
[SEAL.] SAM'L H. CROSS, Secretary of State.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to call the attention of the Senate to the credentials just presented from the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island as a model for that class of papers.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that those credentials be printed, so that we can send them out to the different States as a public document.

Mr. HOAR. That will do very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves that the credentials be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

JACOB G. BOSTALTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. SHERMAN. Pending that, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1818, House bill 5259.

Mr. STEWART. Let the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to its being temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside for the purpose of considering the bill named by him.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5259) to relieve Jacob G. Bostatter from the charge of fraudulent enlistment.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in lines 7 and 9, respectively, by changing the spelling of the name from "Bostatter" to "Bostalter;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to remove from the rolls and records of the War Department now in his office, or under his control, any and all charges of fraudulent enlistment now standing on said rolls against Jacob G. Bostalter, late private in Company H, Thirty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and that said Jacob G. Bostalter be restored to all rights lost or suspended by reason of any such charge.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to relieve Jacob G. Bostalter from the charge of fraudulent enlistment."

AIDS TO NAVIGATION OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent that the pending business may be laid aside informally, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration at this time of Order of Business 1945, House bill 5067, reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. STEWART. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside for the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 5067) establishing additional aids to navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert:

And the sum of $27,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act.

So as to make the bill read:

That there be established additional aids to navigation off and near the passes at the mouth of the Mississippi River, in the State of Louisiana, as follows: Higher and more powerful lights at or near the outer ends of the jetties at the South Pass, to replace those now in existence; a steam or hot-air fog-signal at or near the end of the east jetty; a higher and more powerful light on one of the jetties at the Head of the Passes; and a fog-signal at or near Cubit's Gap, in said Mississippi River; the entire cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $27,500, and the sum of $27,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GIBSON. I move that the Senate ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. FRYE, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. GIBSON were appointed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Senator from Nevada to yield to me for a few minutes, that I may call up a bill?

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to make a motion, and then I will yield. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion until I can have a bill acted upon.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator can do that in the morning.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. COLQUITT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], or I should vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I desire to inquire whether the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is not recorded.

Mr. GEORGE. I will not vote then, as I am paired with him.

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GORMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. BATE (when the name of Mr. HARRIS was called). My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. I should vote "yea," if he were present.

Mr. COKE (when Mr. REAGAN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. REAGAN] was obliged to leave the Chamber to-day. He is paired with some Senator, but I do not remember who it is.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL]. If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE (when Mr. WALTHALL'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALTHALL] is absent on account of indisposition.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. I desire to announce my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Allison,	Hawley,	Riddleberger,	Stockbridge,
Chandler,	Hiscock,	Sawyer,	Teller,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Sherman,	Wilson of Iowa.
Edmunds,	Mitchell,	Stewart,

NAYS—13.

Bate,	Cockrell,	Morgan,	Wilson of Md.
Berry,	Coke,	Payne,
Blodgett,	Gray,	Pugh,
Call,	Hampton,	Saulsbury,

ABSENT—48.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Hearst,	Plumb,
Beck,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Quay,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Ransom,
Blair,	Evarts,	Jones of Nevada,	Reagan,
Bowen,	Farwell,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Brown,	Faulkner,	McPherson,	Spooner,
Butler,	Frye,	Manderson,	Stanford,
Cameron,	George,	Morrill,	Turpie,
Chace,	Gibson,	Paddock,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Gorman,	Palmer,	Vest,
Daniel,	Hale,	Pasco,	Voorhees,
Davis,	Harris,	Platt,	Walthall.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll of the Senate, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Sabin,
Bate,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Berry,	Evarts,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Blodgett,	Faulkner,	Morgan,	Spooner,

Chandler,	Gray,	Pasco,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Payne,	Wilson of Iowa,
Coke,	Hawley,	Platt,	Wilson of Md.
Colquitt,	Hiscock,	Pugh,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-three Senators having answered to their names, further proceedings under the roll-call will be dispensed with, if there be no objection. The question recurs on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART. I will withdraw that now, and give notice that I shall renew it every day until we can agree upon meeting at 11 o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COKE. I make the point of order on that motion that, in the absence of a quorum, the general rule requiring the adjournment to be until 12 o'clock the next day can not be changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The presence of a quorum has been ascertained by the last roll-call. The Chair agrees fully with the Senator from Texas that the hour of 12 o'clock having been fixed by the action of the Senate, by a majority, as the hour of meeting is a standing order that can not be changed by less than a majority; but the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is in order, because a quorum has been disclosed to be present on the roll-call.

Mr. COKE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate do now adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At the request of my friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], I withdraw that motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada has withdrawn his motion, the Chair understands.

Mr. STEWART. I have.

Mr. GIBSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Iowa; but the Senator from Louisiana has a right to make the motion to adjourn.

Mr. GIBSON. I withdraw it to enable the Senator from Iowa to get up his bill.

ADDITIONAL ASSOCIATE JUSTICE FOR WYOMING.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask that the Senate, by unanimous consent, proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1324, Calendar No. 1994.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1324) providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of Wyoming, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 5, after the word "any," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" and in line 9, after the word "court," to insert "unless one of the other justices is disqualified to sit in such action;" so as to make the section read:

That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Wyoming shall consist of a chief-justice and three associates justices, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum; but no justice shall act as a member of the supreme court in any action or proceeding brought to such court by writ of error, bill of exceptions, or appeal from a decision, judgment, or decree rendered by him as judge of a district court, unless one of the other justices is disqualified to sit in such action.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 3, after the word "court," to strike out "in manner now provided by law" and insert "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" and in line 6, after the word "qualified," to insert "and who shall, when appointed, be a resident of said Territory;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the President to appoint one additional associate justice of said supreme court, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, and until his successor is appointed and qualified, and who shall, when appointed, be a resident of said Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Those are the only amendments reported.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8990) to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RETIREMENT OF GENERAL PLEASONTON.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Military Committee instruct me to ask that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] be placed on the conference committee relating to the bill authorizing the retirement of General Pleasonton, in place of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], who is necessarily absent. I ask that the Senator from Minnesota be excused and that the Senator from Nebraska be put in his place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On account of the inability of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] to serve, the Chair will designate as one of the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 2972) authorizing the President to appoint and retire General Pleasonton with the rank and grade of colonel, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON].

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator yield to me to offer a resolution?

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, the hour for the daily meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the present consideration of that resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution lies over under the rule, and will be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHANDLER. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 3, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate July 21, 1888.

POSTMASTERS.

Samuel J. Robinson, at Towson, Baltimore County, Maryland.
Miss Lucy Hocker, at Eminence, Henry County, Kentucky.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate August 2, 1888.

POSTMASTER.

Theodore W. Miller, postmaster at London, Madison County, Ohio.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Sampson, Solon Arnold, Martin A. Anderson, Albert Moritz, to be assistant engineers in the Navy, to rank from 1st day of July, 1883, to follow in the order mentioned immediately after the name of Assistant Engineer William D. Weaver.

Clarence C. Willis, Frank H. Conant, Harry G. Leopold, Robert B. Higgins, Willis B. Day, John C. Leonard [subject to physical examination], Ward P. Winchell, Andrew McAllister [subject to physical examination], to be assistant engineers in the Navy, to rank from the 1st day of July, 1884, in the order mentioned, immediately after the name of Assistant Engineer Charles E. Rommell.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 2, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BRIDGE AT WINONA, MINN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10604) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona, Minn., with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the House concur in the Senate amendments, which are merely formal.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FORT WALLACE MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposition of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments and agree to a conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will allow the amendments to be read.

The Clerk read the amendments in part.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not ask for any further reading of the amendments. I understand the matter now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TURNER]?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDING, JACKSON, MICH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich., with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I ask unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RICHMOND AND DANVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. LEE. I ask unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the House Mr. LEE, Mr. CAMPBELL of Ohio, and Mr. ROWELL.

JOHN W. DURR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 3248) for the relief of John W. Durr; which was read twice.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be now put upon its passage. The amount involved is only $125.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay John W. Durr, of Montgomery, Ala., $125, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in repayment of that sum overpaid by said Durr on cash entry No. 20128, which said entry was made at the land office at Montgomery, Ala.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT]?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HERBERT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, WILKES BARRE, PA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 2535) for the erection of a public building at Wilkes Barre, Pa.; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PIPE-LINES, CHADRON, NEBR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 3331) to grant to the city of Chadron, Nebr., the right to lay pipe across certain tracts of lands; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

BATTLE OF PRINCETON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 3379) in regard to a monumental column to commemorate the battle of Princeton, and appropriating $30,000 therefor; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

J. SCRIBNER & CO.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 1493) for the relief of J. Scribner & Co., of Cleveland, Ohio; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

P. E. PARKER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (S. 3038) for the relief of P. E. Parker.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, a bill exactly like that has been reported by the Committee on Claims in the House; but despairing of getting recognition here I carried it over to the Senate and got the Senators from my State to have it passed there, and I now ask unanimous consent to have the Senate bill considered at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas in the year 1867 one Frank Travis was appointed collector of internal revenue for the western district of Tennessee, who executed bond on the 9th day of May, 1867, in the sum of $100,000, with P. E. Parker as one of his securities; and

Whereas afterward the said Travis became a defaulter and suit was instituted against sureties in the United States circuit court at Memphis, Tenn., in 1874; and

Whereas judgment was obtained against said securities in April, 1875, for $29,747.41, upon which execution was issued and levied on the property of said P. E. Parker, which said property was sold and brought the sum of $2,366.95, which was turned into the Treasury; and

Whereas by act of Congress approved March 3, 1881, the securities were released from liability on the bond or by judgment, upon the ground that after the signing of the bond by the securities Congress increased the duties and liabilities of the collector, thereby changing the contract; and

Whereas prior to this act the Government had collected from the said P. E. Parker the aforesaid sum of $2,366.95: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to said P. E. Parker, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,366.95, in full compensation for the losses sustained in money on payment of said judgment.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Virginia. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to give me his attention for a moment. This is a bill to relieve a man who has been absolutely ruined by an unjust judgment. He is to-day sixty-five or seventy years of age, and is working in the fields for a living. He kept a country store near the place where I was born; he gave me the first pocket-knife I ever had; and when I came here I went to work to get this bill through. [Applause.] I have tried hard to get recognition to bring it up in the House; I have almost worn out a good pair of shoes walking down from my seat to the front here to get recognition to have this bill passed; and now that it has passed the Senate and has come over here, I trust that there will be no objection to its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Before the Chair "hears none," I desire to say a word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not hear the gentleman's objection unless he makes it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I addressed the Chair twice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not cut the gentleman off.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Reserving the right to object, I simply want to say that there must be some arrangement made in which we shall have more reciprocity in these recognitions. There has been already one recognition on the other side, and now there is another asked; and the moment we get through with that the regular order will probably be called, and to-morrow morning the recognitions will begin again on that side of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New Jersey——

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is not the Chair's fault, but the fault of circumstances.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. After the remark of the gentleman, it is due the Chair should state that a number of bills had come over from the Senate, and when they were laid before the House gentlemen interested in certain bills asked their consideration at the present time. It was not a question of recognition by the Chair.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand that; and therefore I am freer to say what I am now saying—that there must be some arrangement to secure more reciprocity in these recognitions, or there will be constant and permanent objection from at least one member of this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. In reference to the bill which has been read, the reason is clear enough why the sureties should be released; but I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] to state on what ground the committee favors the release of the principal.

Mr. ENLOE. The bill does not propose to release the principal at all. This gentleman, P. E. Parker, was on the bond of Frank Travis, who was collector of internal revenue for the western district of Tennessee. Travis proved a defaulter——

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill, then, is for the relief of one of his sureties.

Mr. ENLOE. That is it. Mr. Parker was one of the sureties, and the only one who made an effort to meet his obligations. The Government sacrificed $10,000 worth of his property, and simply ruined him.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon that explanation, I see no objection to the proposition.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I do not rise to object, but to express the hope that the bill may be allowed to pass, because I am sure that our friends on the Democrotic side will then allow two bills to be passed by unanimous consent on the Republican side, one of which I hold in my hand. [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. I hope we shall have a vote on the bill.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ENLOE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, House bill No. 1032, of similar import to the Senate bill just passed, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RENT OF CITADEL ACADEMY, CHARLESTON, S. C.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 100) directing the Secretary of War to investigate and report the amount due to the State of South Carolina for the rent of the Citadel Academy; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be now taken up and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be read first.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate and report the amount due to the State of South Carolina for rent of the Citadel at Charleston, S. C., from August 20, 1867, to February 2, 1882, including the sum equitably due to the State of South Carolina for the loss by fire of the west wing of the said building while in the occupation of the United States, and the appropriation by the United States of the bricks of the said wing to other Government uses; and that he report the result of such investigation to Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. KERR. When did this claim accrue?

Mr. DIBBLE. Between 1867 and 1882.

Mr. KERR. Then it is not a war claim?

Mr. DIBBLE. No, sir.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Before final action is taken on this resolution I ask that the gentleman from South Carolina may have an opportunity to explain it.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It is all right.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would like to hear an explanation.

Mr. DIBBLE. The bill proposes nothing more than to get from the War Department and Quartermaster-General a report, which, as the bill provides, is to be submitted to Congress for its information and as a basis for any action it may take. This resolution embraces no final legislation, but simply provides for bringing the information before Congress. I will ask the Clerk to read the last clause of the resolution.

The concluding portion of the resolution was again read.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPRAISERS' WAREHOUSE, NEW YORK CITY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes, said bill having been returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference requested.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether by these amendments the amount is increased or diminished?

Mr. DIBBLE. The amount is increased, and for that reason I move that the House non-concur.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senate amendments will be non-concurred in and a conference agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. The conferees on the part of the House will be announced later in the day.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOUTH OF BRAZOS RIVER, TEXAS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, August 1, 1888.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2831) for improving the mouth of Brazos River, Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the request of the Senate will be complied with. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. RUSK, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. YODER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. BIGGS, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BLANCHARD, for one week, on account of illness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. LAWLER, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of N. H. Van Zandt.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (S. 1914) for the relief of Mary E. Hopkins;

Joint resolution (S. 27) providing for the printing of a supplement to Wharton's Digest of International Law;

Joint resolution (S. 99) providing for the printing of the portion of the annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on Commerce and Navigation for the year ending June 30, 1887, entitled "Annual Report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in regard to imported merchandise entered for consumption in the United States, with amounts of duty and rates of duty collected;"

Joint resolution (S. 17) to provide for printing additional copies of the map of the edition of 1886, prepared by the Commissioner of Public Lands; and Joint resolution (S. 77) providing for a duplicate of the compilation of the reports of the Senate and House of Representatives from 1815 to 1887.

OHIO CENTENNIAL.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Appropriations from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3182) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government, the Department of Agriculture, the Government Printing Office, and Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the Ohio Centennial, to be held at Columbus, Ohio, from September 4 to October 18, 1888, and put it upon its passage.

Mr. WISE. If this bill is considered will it be in order to offer amendments?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be.

Mr. WISE. Then I want time to offer an amendment, and to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will of course be in the discretion of the House as to the debate upon the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I would suggest to my friend from Ohio not to bring up that bill at this time, as it will likely lead to prolonged debate. It seems to me, in fairness, by reason of certain recognitions on this side, that some similar recognition should be accorded to the other side of the House. If discussion begins on this bill and continues for some time it will most likely result in a demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the last recognition was for a public building on the other side of the House. Besides that, the gentleman was recognized to call up this bill last evening just preceding the hour for adjournment.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. OATES. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

GUSTAVUS W. SMITH.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11062) for the removal of the political disabilities of Gustavus W. Smith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY S. LOGAN.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, the bill (S. 257) granting a pension to Mary S. Logan.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and the recommendation of the committee was concurred in.

ASSISTANTS TO CHIEFS OF BUREAUS, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1438) to provide for the appointment of assistants to the chiefs of bureaus in the Navy Department; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The bill (H. R. 5694) of the same title, reported back by the Committee on Naval Affairs, was laid upon the table.

Mr. WISE. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is not present, but has requested me to obtain consent that he may file a minority report hereafter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the report may be filed to accompany the report of the committee.

There was no objection.

LANDS TO TOWN OF MOSCOW, IDAHO.

Mr. HERMANN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 6842) to grant to the town of Moscow, in Idaho Territory, certain lands for cemetery purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

(The Speaker here resumed the chair.)

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate, as recommended by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If that is the only question before the House——

The SPEAKER. That is the only question. A resolution was read yesterday afternoon and put into the RECORD, but which was not in order when offered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I ask a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is about to submit the question to a vote.

The question is on non-concurring in the Senate amendments.

The amendments were non-concurred in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to withdraw temporarily the resolution which I asked to be printed in the RECORD. In doing so, Mr. Speaker, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not yield the question, but will present it again for the consideration of the House before the amendments are finally acted upon.

The SPEAKER. That is not pending, the Chair thinks, and will be withdrawn.

Mr. HOOKER. What is the request of the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to withdraw the resolution read on yesterday, which is not, in fact, pending.

Mr. SAYERS. I shall not offer any resolution at this time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then there is no further motion pending?

The SPEAKER. There is nothing pending.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that a conference be requested with the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10936) making appropriations to supply the deficiences in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The pending proposition was read, as follows:

Insert the following:

"To pay to John M. Glover the sum of $2,000 in full of all expenses incurred by him in the contested-election case of Glover vs. Frank in the Fiftieth Congress; and to pay to Nathan Frank the sum of $2,000 in full of all expenses incurred by him in the contested-election case of Glover vs. Frank, in the Fiftieth Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COTHRAN. I ask unanimous consent to recur to a section of the bill that has already been passed, for the purpose of offering an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 32, after line 15, insert the following:

"And for support of prisoners of United States courts, balance for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, the sum of $25,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to this section of the bill and to the offering of this amendment? The Chair hears none. The question is now on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. COTHRAN. I send to the Clerk's desk a communication which I wish to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 1, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress copy of a communication from the Attorney-General of the 31st ultimo, submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for "support of prisoners. United States courts," for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, of $25,000.

Respectfully yours,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Secretary.

The SPEAKER House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, July 31, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to request that there be transmitted to Congress an estimate for an appropriation for the support of prisoners for the fiscal year 1887 of $25,000, to be added to the deficiency bill now before the House of Representatives as an amendment. The deficiency appropriation for this same purpose heretofore made at this session was based upon a statement of the amounts due for the support of prisoners in thirty-four districts, not quite one-half of the whole number. Outstanding accounts due in districts not included in that statement, as well as some included therein, which have not been paid—the district of South Carolina, for instance, where nearly $3,000 are due—make it necessary for the Department to ask for this additional appropriation.

Very respectfully,

G. A. JENKS,
Acting Attorney-General.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent to recur to the section immediately preceding the one we are considering, in order that I may offer an amendment which I send up to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 21 the following:

"To pay 15 per cent. in addition to the amount paid for day labor to the employés of the Government Printing Office, such as compositors, pressmen, stereotypers, laborers, press-feeders, RECORD folders, counters, engineers, machinist, firemen; and proof-readers, revisers, copy-holders, make-up, and imposer of the bill force, who were and are exclusively employed on the night forces of the Government Printing Office, but exclusive of compositors on the RECORD, during the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That in estimating the said 15 per cent. credit shall be given the Government for whatever has been paid or is now being paid the said employés above the rates for day work."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to this portion of the bill?

Mr. BURNES. I would not be considered as refusing any courtesy to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], but his amendment is subject to a point of order, and I might as well make objection now and have the amendment excluded as to let it come up and make the point of order afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman withdraw his objection in order that I may make a statement?

Mr. BURNES. I will withhold my objection in order that the gentleman may make a statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This amendment is intended to provide compensation to certain employés of the Government Printing Office who are employed on night work only. They go there at 7 o'clock in the evening and are continuously employed until 3 o'clock in the morning. They receive the same compensation for eight hours' work at night as do persons employed on similar work during the day. This amendment simply provides that inasmuch as they work at night instead of during the day they shall be paid 15 per cent. in addition to what is paid to day employés for the same class of work. I think it is manifestly proper that they should be so paid.

Mr. BURNES. The express statutes governing this case give to the Public Printer absolute power to fix the wages of his employés, and in the face of such a statute the amendment of my friend would, of course, be out of order; and therefore we may as well stop it now by objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Public Printer has power under the law to pay the night force more than is paid the day force for the same length of time on the same class of work?

Mr. BURNES. The law provides that the Public Printer shall fix the compensation of these individuals, provided that he shall not pay more than 40 cents an hour. Therefore the power is with the Public Printer to pay them up to 40 cents an hour, and in the face of that statute I can not accede to the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask if the effect of the gentleman's argument is that the force employed during the day may be paid at a rate of compensation below 40 cents, and that then these employés, in whose interest this amendment is offered, could be paid an additional compensation not to exceed 40 cents an hour?

Mr. BURNES. I will say to my friend from Tennessee that there may be a fault in the law, but so long as it is the law we are bound by it on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HEARD. I will ask my colleague whether the rate of compensation allowed to the day force is equal to 40 cents an hour?

Mr. BURNES. There is no discrimination so far as I know between the compensation paid to the day force and that paid to the night force, but the Public Printer can make such discrimination from 40 cents an hour down.

Mr. HEARD. As I understand my colleague's reply, it is to the effect that the rate of compensation for day work now is 40 cents. That being so, there is no way for the Public Printer to discriminate so as to pay more for the night work unless he reduces the compensation of the day force. He can not increase the compensation of the night force above that figure.

Mr. BURNES. In answer to my colleague I will call his attention to the fact that very few of these employés receive 40 cents an hour. The great majority of them receive less than 40 cents an hour, and therefore as to that class of employés the Public Printer can increase their compensation if he desires to do so.

Mr. HEARD. My question is answered. I realize that there ought to be a difference between the compensation paid for night work and that paid for day work, and I desired only to know that the law gave the Public Printer such power as would enable him to make a discrimination in favor of those who do night work.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] is mistaken. I think the men are all paid 40 cents an hour. Do I understand the Chair to exclude the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to returning to the section.

Mr. BURNES. I suggest to my friend from Tennessee that we might as well stop the amendment here, as it would be subject to the point of order, and there is no object in extending to him a barren courtesy from which no fruit could possibly grow.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay to the widow and legal heirs of the late J. T. Updegraff, a member-elect to the Forty-eighth Congress, but who died before the time of its organization, $6,000.

Mr. SHAW. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in after line 20.

The amendment was read, as follows:

To equalize the salaries and pay of forty-three persons engaged in the performance of the duties of messengers of the House of Representatives, as mentioned and designated in House Miscellaneous Document No. 263, Fiftieth Congress, first session, $4,582, said amount to be so applied as to make the compensation of each of said persons, as nearly as may be, $100 per month for the time they are so employed.

Mr. SHAW. This amendment is for the purpose of equalizing the pay of the messengers of the House. Some of them are now receiving $70 a month and others $100 a month, while all are rendering like service. This discrimination, to say the least of it, is invidious and unjust, and ought to be corrected, and I trust there will be no objection to this amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that it be considered now.

Mr. KERR objected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line —:
"To pay Turner K. Hackman for services rendered as riding page for twenty days previous to the organization of the present Congress, $50."

Mr. SHAW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in after line 5.

The amendment was read, as follows:

To pay Edward W. Coughlan for services rendered as messenger to the Committee on Accounts during the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, $150.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to have an explanation of that.

Mr. SHAW. This young man has rendered service to the Committee on Accounts during the entire session; he has acted as messenger or page to that committee, and I have been authorized by the committee to offer this resolution. There is constant communication between the Committee on Accounts and the Chief Clerk of the House, and every member of the committee, as well as the Chief Clerk, if he were permitted to testify, would say that the services of this young man have been indispensable.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is he on the roll?

Mr. SHAW. He is not. We did not know that we should require the services of a page, and therefore did not ask the House to allow us one, as we might have done. If he had been appointed in the usual way, his pay would have been $60 a month, which would have amounted to a great deal more than the sum named in this amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I shall not object; but according to my recollection this is the first time that we have had an application from the Committee on Accounts for an expenditure of this kind.

Mr. CANNON. Is this young man in the employ of the Government?

Mr. SHAW. No, sir; he is not in the employ of the Government in any regular way.

The question was taken; and on a division the amendment was rejected—ayes 26, noes 30.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Charles Carter for extra services rendered during the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress, $50.

Mr. HOLMES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 35 after line 19.

The amendment was read, as follows:

To pay Ralph T. Moses for services rendered as assistant folder in the seal-room from December 5, 1887, to July 25, 1888, $125.

Mr. HOLMES. This young man has done the work, and has not received any pay. He has rendered bona fide service in the seal-room, and I think he ought to be allowed reasonable compensation therefor. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. BURNES. I should like to hear a statement of the ground upon which this appropriation is asked for.

Mr. HOLMES. On the ground that the service has been actually performed and has not been paid for.

Mr. BURNES. Is this man upon the roll?

Mr. HOLMES. He is not. He was put to work there and has not been paid for it.

Mr. BURNES. By whose authority was he put to work without being on the roll?

Mr. HOLMES. I am not advised what officer of the House put him there.

Mr. BURNES. I feel compelled in such a case as this to interpose an objection.

Mr. HOLMES. I think the gentleman from Missouri will see the propriety of this employé receiving pay for services actually rendered.

Mr. BURNES. I see no authority for the employment.

Mr. HOLMES. It is one of a class of cases constantly occurring in this House and in the various Departments of the Government.

Mr. BURNES. But no officer of the House reports that this young man has been employed or has rendered service.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I personally know that he rendered service during that time. A part of the service was rendered to myself in sealing documents for me.

Mr. HOLMES. He sealed documents for every member of the House, I presume, during that time. I trust the gentleman from Missouri will not object.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Has not this young man since been put on the rolls by a resolution of the House?

Mr. HOLMES. I do not know how that may be.

Mr. BURNES. I am just informed that he was put on the roll by a resolution of the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is to pay him for a time when he rendered service prior to being placed on the rolls by that resolution. I know personally that he was here and performed service.

Mr. HOLMES. I do not understand that he was ever paid for the time covered by this amendment. If I believed he had been paid, I would not of course offer the amendment. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOOTHMAN], a member of the Committee on Accounts, informs me that the time named in this amendment was not covered by the resolution placing him on the roll.

Mr. BLOUNT. It appears, Mr. Chairman, that this person was put on the rolls for some weeks prior to authority for his employment, although since that time he was placed on the rolls by authority of a resolution of the House. In itself, this matter seems innocent, but I recall the fact as you will, Mr. Chairman, that some years ago just such transactions as this, occurring in a number of instances, so outraged the sentiment of this House and the country as to force the resignation of the person who was then Doorkeeper. I do not believe that any officer of this House should take upon himself authority to bring any charge against the Government by such action, with the expectation of having the House cure the difficulty by a resolution. What I now say is not for the purpose of casting any reflection upon the present officer, for I do not undertake to say that he is not efficient and honorable. But this is a single instance of what, as I have said, became at one time a scandal before the country; and I want to say here and now to the Doorkeeper, or any other officer of this House, that from now on I shall resist to whatever extent I may be able any such illegal action on the part of any officer of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] object to the consideration of the amendment?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not object in this case; but I was not willing to have the amendment pass without recalling to the House the scandals which have grown out of such an exercise of power on the part of the Doorkeeper. If he may do such a thing in one instance, he may do it without limit. I hope he will take notice that such a thing is not to occur again.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the amendment is before the Committee of the Whole for consideration.

Mr. BURNES. I wish to say on behalf of the Doorkeeper that he did not undertake to employ this boy at all. The boy, having once before been compensated for voluntary service, concluded that he could get compensation again. He simply performed this work voluntarily, expecting to get compensation. He took his chances, as he had done before. Therefore the Doorkeeper is not at all censurable in this transaction. If the Committee of the Whole sees proper to adopt the provision for payment in this case, I have no objection.

Mr. HOOKER. It should also be remarked in defense of the Doorkeeper that his action was indorsed by a subsequent resolution of the House placing this young man on the roll, so that there can be no reflection at all in this matter on the Doorkeeper.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The case, then, stands in this position: For a period of time this young man was here performing work for which he has not yet been paid. I personally know that he did render the service. He did work for myself during that period, and I saw him doing it for others. Subsequently, by resolution of the House, he was placed on the rolls. This amendment is simply to compensate him for the time he was here performing this work prior to his being placed on the rolls. Gentlemen here accepted his services, and we ought to pay for them. That is the whole situation.

The amendment of Mr. HOLMES was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay George W. Knox for hauling books and placing them in the rooms in the terrace of the House wing of the Capitol, $222.77.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit the amendment I send to the desk, involving about $40, and also ask that a certificate accompanying the paper be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay W. D. Hunter for thirty-eight days' work during the recess of the Forty-ninth Congress, at the rate of $40 per month.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the accompanying certificate be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 1, 1888.

I hereby certify that W. D. Hunter was employed in the House document-room for thirty-eight days during the recess between the Forty-ninth and the Fiftieth Congresses, for which he was not paid, at the rate of $40 per month.

C. H. HARRIS,
File Clerk House Document-Room.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay E. B. Wade, clerk of the Committee on Printing, for services to June 15, 1888, as clerk to the Select Committee Investigating the Government Printing Office, $500.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I wish to offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Edward S. MacDonald for services rendered to Select Committee Investigating the Government Printing Office, $50.

Mr. BURNES. I shall feel compelled to make objection unless there be some suitable reason given for this amendment.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will state that this amendment is to pay for the services of a messenger employed in the investigating committee, which should have been embodied in the preceding paragraph of the bill just read, providing for the payment of the clerk of the committee.

The service was rendered by this young man, but the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] failed to bring in the matter at the time that the preceding item was brought in and for which payment is recommended. I want to state further that the minority claim to have paid out over $200 for services on this committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me ask why it is that this matter has not been submitted to the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I might ask the same with reference to the paragraph read a few moments ago, and which was adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT. And I should have concurred entirely in the propriety of that. I did not expect another like this to follow so soon or I would have objected to the other provision to which consent was given.

Mr. BURNES. I do not think that there was objection to the preceding paragraph of the bill. That came before the committee from the Committee on Printing through its chairman as the request of the committee, and from a respectable committee of the House, transmitting through its chairman a request that that item of expenditure be allowed. The committee could not do otherwise than to make an allowance for the payment as asked, on account of an obligation which the committee had assumed, and for a service that was reported to have been fairly rendered.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is just it.

Mr. BURNES. But this comes in no such way. The committee never asked, nor did any member of the committee, so far as I know, for this allowance.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I want to say, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Printing will bear me out, that this matter was submitted in the Committee on Printing at the same time, and more than that it was agreed upon by the committee that it was a just claim. I simply rest the proposition upon that statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let it be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendment?

Mr. BURNES. I shall certainly interpose an objection unless the gentleman will state, or some one representing the Committee on Printing, that this liability has been incurred at the instance of the committee, and its payment is asked by the committee.

Mr. LONG. The chairman of the committee is present.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The chairman can answer the question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I understand it, this young man was retained by my colleague on the minority of the committee, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. He spoke to me about it a few days ago, and said he had incurred this liability serving him and the minority of the committee. The committee itself did not take any action, it is proper for me to say, and did not employ the young man; but I know he was there and rendered service to my colleague representing the minority; and I am quite sure he rendered him valuable service. I interpose no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. He was not appointed by the committee?

Mr. RICHARDSON. He was not.

Mr. BURNES. I think, in view of the statement of the gentleman from New York, backed up by the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, that I shall interpose no further objection, the services being rendered, and apparently the case presents a proper question for our action.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. What is the status of the question?

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous request is asked to submit the amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I shall object to it under my understanding of the case. It seems to be a claim to pay for private services. Let the committee pay such expenses themselves.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay George Winters and L. B. Cook $200 each, being the difference between their pay as conductors of the elevator and $1,200 per annum from July 1, 1886, to July 1, 1888, $400.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, an amendment was offered some little while ago by the gentleman from Maryland under this head, and I do not know that I understood fully its meaning and object. I would desire that the objection be withdrawn, at least so that we may understand what is the scope of the amendment touching the equalization in pay of certain messengers performing duties as doorkeepers. I do not know who offered it, but I think the gentleman from Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. It was offered by the gentleman from Maryland to equalize the pay of messengers, involving some $4,000. Is there further objection?

Mr. CANNON. I want to understand what the resolution does. As I understand it, these persons who are employed about the doors here have been found insufficient in numbers, and details have been made from the Doorkeeper's roll of the lower-priced employés, perhaps $60 or $65 a month, to perform in fact the duties of doorkeepers here.

Mr. BURNES. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. This is not a proposition, then, to decrease anybody's pay?

Mr. BURNES. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON. But to increase the pay of certain employés from $60 or $65 to what?

Mr. BURNES. To $100 a month.

Mr. CANNON. During the session?

Mr. BURNES. Some during the session and some are annual, I think.

Mr. CANNON. But during the session?

Mr. BURNES. During the year.

Mr. CANNON. During the whole year?

Mr. SHAW. It would be during the whole year if they were all on the annual roll. There are two who are on the session roll; the others are on the annual roll; and this amendment is for the purpose of equalizing their pay. Some of them receive but $70 a month. You can find at the different doors of the House, on either side, one man who is receiving $70 while another is receiving $100 for rendering exactly the some character of service.

Mr. CANNON. Then it is rather equalizing than increasing the salaries.

Mr. SHAW. To those who receive but $60 it is an increase to $100.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask another question. When does the payment cease?

Mr. SHAW. Those who are on the annual roll will continue to draw their pay at $100, while those on the session roll will receive it during the remainder of the session and then it will cease and they will go their way as they have heretofore.

Mr. CANNON. Their services end with the session?

Mr. BURNES. Some do and some do not.

Mr. CANNON. What do you ask?

Mr. SHAW. That we appropriate sufficient money to equalize the pay and to make it $100 for those who are on the session roll.

Mr. CANNON. During the session or during the year?

Mr. SHAW. During the time they are employed.

Mr. CANNON. Somebody said that I objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] objected.

Mr. CANNON. Then it is not necessary for me to say I did not.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I object.

Mr. SHAW. I think it was the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] who objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has now reached that part of the bill relating to judgments of the Court of Claims, beginning at page 37 and ending at the bottom of page 51. If there be no objection the Clerk will pass these over. Is there objection?

The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

For payment of judgments and awards recovered against the United States for flowage damages caused by the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin, and reported to Congress by the Attorney-General in Senate Executive Document No. 181, Fiftieth Congress, first session, namely:

Mr. HOVEY. I move pro forma to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it has not been my intention to labor again to procure recognition by the Chair this session for a second speech, but finding a publication in the Sunday number of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in which allusion is made to some remarks made by me in this House in April, I have concluded that it is my duty to reply.

The publication to which I refer purports to be the "Speech of Hon. COURTLAND C. MATSON, of Indiana, in the House of Representatives, Saturday, July 28, 1888."

I need not say to the members of this House that no such speech was delivered on that day and that no allusion is made to it in the Congressional proceedings of that Saturday.

In this printed speech my colleague [Mr. MATSON] labors to show that the Democratic party is, and has been, the true friend of the ex-soldiers of the United States.

In this Herculean task I do not wonder that he has preferred to print his speech in the RECORD rather than meet with prompt replies to his bold and unfounded assertions.

The Representative on this floor who does not know that the Republican party in this House this session has earnestly labored from the first day to the present hour to procure the consideration of pension legislation, and that the Democratic party here has as earnestly and persistently labored to prevent it, is an imbecile who should be sent to some asylum for safe-keeping.

There can not be found an intelligent man who has watched the proceedings of this House who does not fully understand the motives and attitude of the respective parties on this subject, and that the Democratic party, from the President down to his lowest follower, is strongly opposed to all pension legislation.

In my first speech in this House, on the 20th of April, I said:

On the 4th of January last I offered a service-pension bill, No. 1320, granting a pension of $8 per month for life to every honorably-discharged officer, soldier, or sailor who had served in the Army of the United States not less than sixty days between March 4, 1861, and July 1, 1865. This bill was the same day referred to the Invalid Pensions Committee. On the same day I offered bill No. 1319, granting a bounty of 160 acres of land to every officer, soldier, and sailor engaged in the military or naval service of the United States during the late rebellion of the so-called Confederate States. On the 16th of January last I offered a bill, No. 5052, "to equalize the payment and do justice to the officers, soldiers, and sailors of the United States in the late rebellion who were paid in currency commonly called 'greenbacks,'" which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

I had hoped that at least one of these bills might possibly meet with the favor of one of those omnipotent committees, and be reported to this House for fair discussion, so that a vote on the ayes and noes might be taken; but, like many other bills which have been introduced for the relief of the ex-soldiers of the late rebellion, neither of them has been reported; and they, too, have been smothered or filed in the unremembered pigeon-holes of the committee-rooms. Our ex-soldiers and sailors seem to be forgotten. Even the President in his message made no allusion to them, their services, or their sufferings, and his henchmen and partisans are following silently and closely in his footsteps.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask to correct the gentleman in reference to his statement about a bill referred to the Military Committee.

Mr. HOVEY. I can not yield.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman will not violate the proprieties of the House. He refers to a bill that had no relation to the work before our committee, and which was sent back to the House and transferred to another committee, and that is what I want to call attention to.

Mr. HOVEY. I can not yield to an interruption.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions is composed of nine Democrats and six Republicans, the Committee on Public Lands nine Democrats and five Republicans, and the Committee on Military Affairs eight Democrats and six Republicans, so that the Democrats of those committees have the power to report to this House any bill referred to them, or they can crush, by refusing to report, every bill offered in favor of the ex-soldier. The responsibility is theirs; and I assure them they will be well remembered hereafter by the men whose rights they have so unfeelingly ignored.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the committees to whom those important bills have been referred dare not bring one of them before this House for fair discussion and action. The people who do not understand the gag rules of this House are watching with wonder and blaming their Representatives for not forcing a vote on the most important questions of the day.

It must not be forgotten that my colleague, the honorable and gallant Colonel MATSON, is the chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee, my much esteemed and ancient friend, Mr. HOLMAN, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and my colleague, Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, whose district joins mine across the Wabash River, is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

If I am correctly informed, no report has been made by the said committees on either of my bills, and hence under the rules of this House it is impossible to press either of them for further legislative action.

With over one hundred and ninety bills in favor of the rights of ex-soldiers, referred to said committees, no day or days have as yet been set apart for their consideration.

Hundreds of thousands of soldiers at this and former sessions have petitioned for redress and relief in vain. Their petitions now are never read in the session of the House, but are buried in the box at the feet of the Speaker, and are then sent silently to the archives of the nation!

Verily that great and grand old right of petition has lost its ancient force and grandeur. Its denial once by George III was assigned in the Declaration of American Independence as one of the causes which led to the liberty of this country. May its virtual suppression here fail to lose that which it formerly helped to gain.

That there has been a studied and systematic course of opposition pursued by my colleagues on the other side of this House against all general pension legislation can not be honestly denied by any member.

To show how this denial has been systematically pursued I will present a few facts that can not be controverted.

My colleague, Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, in his speech in this House on the 10th of July, shows what efforts he has made to have days assigned and set apart for such legislation. He says:

On the 21st day of May last I offered the following preamble and resolution:

"Whereas the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House has reported House bill No. 9961, by Report No. 2120, entitled 'A bill relating to the arrears of pensions,' with recommendation that it do pass; and

"Whereas said committee in said report estimate that said bill, if passed, will cause the expenditure of $250,000,000; and

"Whereas all political parties profess to be in favor of granting to the Union soldiers of 1861 to 1865 liberal pensions for service rendered; and

"Whereas on the 19th day January last, House bill No. 3345, granting a pension to all such soldiers, was referred to said committe; and

"Whereas it is important that said several propositions should be disposed of before any bill is passed materially reducing the revenues of the country: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of said House bill No. 3345, and that said bill, and said bill No. 9961, reported by said committee, be made a special order for Friday, the 25th day of May, and that the consideration thereof shall continue from day to day until they are disposed of."

This resolution, asking that these bills should be considered, was, by the ruling of the Speaker, sent to the Committee on Rules, and, strange to say, since the introduction of that resolution there has never been a report from that committee, although Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, representing the minority of the committee, stated publicly upon this floor that the Republicans composing the minority had gone to the Speaker, who is ex officio chairman thereof, and requested that the committee be called together for the purpose of taking action thereon, and further stating that there had been no meeting of the committee.

Fearing that the Speaker, in the multiplicity of duties that are crowding upon him, had overlooked the matter, I again, on the 9th day of June, offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Wednesday, the 13th day of June, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of House bill No. 9961, granting arrears of pensions and providing for the payment thereof; and that the consideration thereof shall be continued from day to day until the same is disposed of"— which also went to the Committee on Rules, and which has suffered the like fate of its predecessor.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show other efforts in the same direction without success.

In May last the Republican members of the House, becoming dissatisfied with the many evasions and long delays in regard to pension legislation, signed a request or petition and delivered it to the Committee on Rules, of which the Speaker, Mr. CARLISLE, is chairman. I now present to the House a copy of the same:

To the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned members of the House of Representatives, feeling the great need of prompt legislation for the relief of Union veterans and their dependent ones, respectfully urge your committee to set apart, at as early a day as possible, three or four days for the consideration of general pension legislation.

And now, Mr. Chairman, we are here on the 2d day of August with all our requests ignored and unheeded, and the petitions and prayers of thousands of ex-soldiers unread and disregarded. The history of legislation presents no parallel to this outrage upon the rights of the people.

Need I ask why these ex-soldiers are refused a hearing? Need I ask who refuses them? The Democratic side of this House dare not vote upon the bills which I have presented, for they know it would be the political death-knell of every Northern Democrat who should vote against either of them. They know the Presidential election in November is close at hand, and that they are in danger of the veto of either the President or their constituents.

Do you ask for still stronger proof that the Democracy as a party are still opposed to the ex-soldiers as the majority of them were from 1861 to 1865? You have the answer in the President's message, and the provisions of the Mills tariff bill which they have lately passed in this House by a majority of 13.

Does not every ex-soldier know that if that bill becomes a law, it must necessarily destroy all hopes of future pensions? There would be no surplus nor revenue to pay the soldier.

Mr. MCMILLIN, of Tennessee, Mr. MILLS's ablest lieutenant in the debate on the tariff, said:

Mr. Chairman, what is the bill that we present for your consideration? It is a bill which proposes to take $878,000 off of chemicals; $1,756,000 off of earthen and glass ware; $11,480,000 off of sugar; $331,000 off of provisions; $227,000 off of cotton goods; $2,042,000 off of hemp, jute, and flax goods; $12,330,000 off of woolens; $3,000 off of books and papers, and $1,090,000 off of sundries. It is also proposed to add to your free-list flax, hemp, jute, chemicals, salt, tin-plate, wool, and other things, amounting to $22,189,000, making in all a tariff reduction of $63,720,000. It proposes to made reductions in the internal revenue of $24,455,000, or a grand total of tax reductions from tariff and internal-revenue sources of $78,176,000.

Sir, when that grand reduction of our revenue takes place, if it ever does, we must bid farewell to all future taxation to raise a revenue to pay our ex-soldiers their just demands.

THE WAR TAX.

We are told that our revenue is now derived from "war taxes." Mr. MILLS and his colleagues on the tariff debate have repeated this over and over again. "The war tax," "the war tax," "the war tax" has been ringing through this Chamber for the last month, until the walls almost retain and reverberate its echo.

Now, it must be clear that if it is a war tax, our great surplus in the Treasury, which now amounts to over $130,000,000, should be primarily expended for war debts.

1. To the ex-soldiers who made it possible for our Government to pay any debts; and

2. To the bondholders who supplied our Government with the "sinews of war" during the late rebellion.

The bondholders should be fully paid, but we should not entirely forget a little of the inside history. Bonds were bought with "greenbacks" at a discount; many of them were purchased at 70 cents to the dollar, when greenbacks were not worth more than 60 or 70 cents, thus making the actual cost to the bondholders about 50 cents to the dollar. These bonds have since risen in value until they are now held as high as $1.28 in gold, and they have drawn interest from the date of their issue.

The soldier in his financial operations has not fared quite so well, for he was compelled to receive his "greenbacks" when on a general average they were not worth more than 60 cents to the dollar, and he has never received either principal or interest for his losses on his depreciated paper. If the ex-soldier did not love "Uncle Sam" so well, and if a suit at law could be brought for the difference between the greenback and the gold dollar, there is no court in the world where justice is administered where he could not obtain a judgment. There can be no shadow of doubt upon his rights.

PENSION BILLS.

The pension bill vetoed by the President in 1887 only provided for ex-soldiers where there was a "total inability to procure their subsistence by daily labor."

The Grand Army bill referred to by my colleague [Mr. MATSON] defines the disability to be that "which totally incapacitates them for the performance of manual labor." The substitute reported to this House for the Senate bill also defines the disability to be that "which totally incapacitates them for the performance of manual labor."

But my colleague, the chairman of the Invalid Pension Committee [Mr. MATSON], leaves no room to doubt what his views are in regard to pensions which should now be given to his comrades.

In his House bill No. 1329 he clearly draws the line that would cut off all from such relief except those "who are now disabled, and are dependent upon charity for a sustenance," and requires that the disability must be such "as would incapacitate them for any manual labor, and who are dependent upon public charity for their sustenance."

In other words, no ex-soldier under his bill could apply for a pension without first swearing he was a pauper, and then sustaining his claim by proving that he was an object of charity and wholly unable to perform any manual labor.

I can not concur in favoring such a bill, but on the contrary would most gladly extend and grant a pension to every soldier who has served sixty days and who has received an honorable discharge. That service, discharge, and proof of his identity would be all the red tape that I would require. But my gallant comrade and colleague draws a line where supplication and beggary begin, and Charity comes with open hand to the rescue. I want no charity for the men who fought with me; I want justice, that justice which has been meted out to all the soldiers of the United States who stood by the Stars and Stripes in other days. God forbid that any soldier who fought by my side, or under our glorious banner, should be compelled to beg our Government, which he faced death to save, for a pittance to keep him from the poor-house.

The men who stood shoulder to shoulder on the crimsoned fields of death for the preservation of our Government should never be required by any act of Congress to beg their bread like paupers. Such laws, in my opinion, would be deep stains upon our statute, and I can not understand how any true soldier could consent to place his comrade in that degrading condition.

Sir, I deeply regret the position of my colleague [Mr. MATSON], for with his prestige as a soldier, his talent, force, ability, and position he may be able to check and defeat the enactment of laws which would throw rays of sunshine over many a now gloomy household of his comrades, who boldly faced death under his commands.

My colleague warmly espouses the principles of the Mills tariff bill. He says:

I am now and have been constantly since that overshadowing issue was made a consistent and earnest friend of every measure that has been proposed for relief from overtaxation. I yield to no one in devotion to this cause, for I believe it to be the cause of all the people, and the soldiers are only a part of the great body-politic.

The substance of this, if I understand it, is that the ex-soldier's rights must give way to the omnipotency of the Mills tariff bill, to the wisdom of free-trade reformers. This no doubt is loyal and true Democracy as held and taught by the leaders of the party. But my friend, seeing the effects of the Mills bill in reducing the revenue out of which pensions must be paid, as a panacea, threatens to tax the rich men of our country to raise the funds out of which the soldier shall be paid. That is a long way off; we have the surplus now; why wait "for dead men's shoes?" I will admonish my friend that before such an act will ever pass this House the last tombstone placed above the graves of our veterans will have its marble crumbled into dust. Such promises are more than vain.

To avoid the dilemma in which he finds the President and his party on pension legislation, my friend makes a defense something in the nature of an old English plea, called in law Latin an absque hoc, or to make it a little more intelligible, if possible, "without this, that." He says:

At no time since the 4th of March, 1861, has the Democratic party been charged with the full responsibility of Government. The ridiculous rates given in some cases where the fractions of a cent are computed, and of which my distinguished colleague General HOVEY saw fit on the floor of this House recently to complain so bitterly, are the results of laws enacted while the Republican party had full control of the Government. When he holds these up to the contempt he is simply displaying the wrongs done to the soldiers by his own party.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall not stop to inquire who enacted such ridiculous rules and laws. Here is the part of my remarks to which my colleague alludes:

We are flippantly told that our pension laws are ample and the most beneficent in the world, and that no ex-soldier has the right to find the least fault with the generosity and paternal care of our Government.

Yes, we have pension laws where the red-tape appendages, employés, and machinery alone, not including any pensions, cost our Government over $1,000,000 annually to dole out a pittance that would starve a dog to thousands of helpless men, widows, and orphans!

Sir, we ought to be ashamed of our niggardly legislation, for our nation is too great for such pitiful parsimony. The one hundred and fifty-one rounds in the Jacob's ladder which leads the veteran to the Pension Department are simply ridiculous.

I have read where the noble Brutus proposed to "coin his heart and drop his blood for drachmas," but it was reserved for our Solons, who framed our pension laws, to measure the value of our veterans' blood by the fraction of one copper cent!

Only think of the blood and wounds of our soldiers being valued at $2.12½ per month; at $2.66⅔ per month; $4.66⅔ per month. The fraction of one copper cent by halves and thirds being set apart in fifteen of the one hundred and fifty-one grades to our maimed, broken-down, and wounded soldiers! These wise men must have had Shylock's famous "balance" to weigh their brother's blood, and after they had weighed the blood they must have examined every wound with a strong political microscope before they could figure pensions down to the fraction of one copper cent!

I may say that the Commissioner of Pensions (General Black) was my comrade, as we were at one time in the same army, and I have always regarded him as a gallant soldier and entertained for him great respect. I blame him not in his official capacity, for I believe he has been only acting in obedience to the command of his superiors in office. By his last report, in June, 1887, he shows that there were then on the pension-rolls 1,131 persons who received $1 per month, 30,823 who received $2 per month, and 65,946 who received $4 per month, and on the pension-rolls to-day there are over 100,000 persons who are now receiving 3½ to 13 cents per day! What magnificent generosity from a Government that has been saved and preserved by their valor, their sufferings, and their blood! These are some of the pensions about which we hear such loud and bombastic boastings.

I feel sure that my comrade and colleague feels ashamed to see such rules and laws governing our Pension Department; I am sure I do. Let us snatch the child from the fire. We will have time enough to inquire about its parentage afterwards. Give us legislation and let us wipe out all such flummery without regard to the source from whence it came.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a bill of fare collected and collated by my comrade and colleague [Mr. GROSVENOR] of Ohio on the 12th day of June last:

House bill 5068, to amend the act for the arrears of pensions; House bill 4986, to provide a hearing in pension cases; House bill 4952, to amend the law as to the commencement of pensions; House bill 5623, to amend the law relative to pensions; House bill 5642, to regulate evidence in pension cases; House bill 5674, to grant pensions to dependent soldiers; House bills 5036 and 5678, to amend the acts granting pensions; House bill 5627, to increase the rate for total disability in pension cases; House bill 1688, relative to pensions for dependent parents; House bill 1537, to increase rates for loss of both arms; House bill 8392, to allow additional pensions for other disabilities to those pensioned for loss of limb; House bill 8688, to pay arrears of pensions to surviving children of soldiers in pension cases; House bill 8378, to grant service pensions; House bill 9060, to allow pensions in case of loss of limb; House bill 9069, to fix rates of pensions by rank held at date of discharge; House bill 9277, to increase the rate of pensions for total disability; House bill 9743, to repeal the prohibition of pensions to volunteers who may previously have been conscripted into the Confederate service; House bill 9737, for the equalization of pensions; House bill 9737, to grant service pensions; House bill 10055, to fix the rates of pensions for loss of sight; and House bill 10055, to grant pensions to widows and children, at divers times during the present session of Congress were duly referred to the standing Committee on Invalid Pensions.

It can not be denied that this House has had a sufficient number of bills before it from which a selection could be made to eradicate any evil that may exist under our laws in regard to pensions. The committee of which my colleague, Mr. MATSON, is chairman, can easily have all these evils removed if it will only give us three or four days of fair and honest legislation, but up to this hour that committee has not been assigned a single day for general pension legislation.

Poor Committee on Invalid Pensions! It has been shorn of all its jurisdiction over general pension legislation, and its labors are now confined to a few short nights on private pension bills, which are only permitted to be set up like ten-pins that the President may have the pleasure with his wit and sarcasm to knock down with his veto balls!

VETOES.

The President's vetoes are defended by my colleague and eulogized as being the essence of perfection. He says:

And so the President in the discharge of his duty, not with malice or ill-will towards the claimant, but with a desire to do his duty only, states the facts upon which he founded his objections. I challenge any of his loud accusers to show any single instance in which he has animadverted unnecessarily against the claimant. When this wholesale charge is made, ask for the specification. Let the case be cited, and the facts and the criticism go together.

Yes, let us have the facts where such facts are fairly and legally obtained, but it must not be overlooked that much of what the President calls facts is procured by the Pension Department and is entirely ex parte. The soldier is seldom present, nor has he a chance of meeting his accusers face to face and cross-examine the witnesses who testify against him before the inquisitorial examiners of the Pension Department.

Remembering this, the President should not unnecessarily tarnish the character of any one. His exalted position should forbid it. But he has not hesitated to give such loose evidence or statements all the sanction of his high official authority.

I will quote a few of his charges, flings, and sarcasms that he has used in vetoing the pension bills of poor and broken-down ex-soldiers who were defending our country whilst he, the President, was out of danger and at his ease in Buffalo.

In the veto of the bill passed for John W. Ferris, June, 1886, he uses the following language:

The ingenuity developed in the constant and persistent attacks upon the public Treasurer by those claiming pensions, and in the increase of those already granted, is exhibited in bold relief by this attempt to include sore eyes among the results of diarrhea.

Again, in the case of John W. Luce, June, 1886:

It is alleged that the examinations made by the Pension Bureau developed the fact that the deceased soldier was a man of quite intemperate habits. June, 1886.

In his veto in the case of Alfred Denny, June, 1886, who swore that he was injured by being thrown forward on the pommel of his saddle, the President becomes facetious and says:

The number of instances in which those of our soldiers who rode horses during the war were injured by being thrown forward on their saddles indicates that those saddles were very dangerous contrivances.

The innuendo clearly points to the charge that many claimants of that kind were perjured. I most earnestly advise the President not to try any saddle of that kind himself, or he might change his opinion.

In the case of Edward Ayers, May, 1886, the President in his veto says:

It is reported to me by a report from the Pension Bureau that after the alleged wound and in May or June, 1863, the claimant deserted and was arrested in the State of Indiana and returned to duty without trial.

Here the President fastens on the ex-soldier a stain and a crime, the penalty of which would have been death, on the authority of a mere report.

In the case of David W. Hamilton, May, 1886, he says:

If he had filed his application earlier it would have appeared in better faith, and it may be that he would have secured the evidence of his family physician if it was of the character he described.

His delay in filing his claim, in the mind of the President, seems conclusive proof of perjury.

Every soldier who has served in the Army will realize the injustice of the charge as made by the President. Many poor soldiers, from pride, have been restrained for years from presenting their just claims for a pension.

The wit and humor of the President rise again to the surface in his veto of the bill of Andrew I. Wilson, in June, 1886.

Whatever else may be said of this claimant's achievements during his short military career, it must be conceded that he accumulated a great deal of disability.

Other cases might be multiplied in his numerous vetoes, but I deem it unnecessary to make more public his charges against soldiers of drunkenness and loathsome diseases.

It should not be forgotten that in all his vetoes of private pension bills he virtually accuses every claimant and many witnesses with willful perjury, and the reports upon which he promulgates his libelous charges are founded on one-sided reports and rumors. If he were not shielded by his Presidential mantle actions for libel could be successfully brought against him on many of his vetoes. It should be remembered that he judges the claimant from his standpoint and not by the testimony of the claimant and his witnesses under oath, backed by the full indorsement of the Senate and House of Representatives. Surely in such cases the power and cruelty of the one man is very great.

PRESIDENT'S APPROVAL OF ACTS.

My colleague goes into extacies over the approval by the President of the following acts: Widow's act, March 12, 1886; act of August 4, 1886, increasing pensions to crippled soldiers; act granting pensions to Mexican soldiers; act of June 7, 1888, granting arrears to widows of soldiers. If these acts were approved by the President without the coercion of political pressure, he is entitled to credit for simply performing a humane duty; but it might be important to inquire who formulated those bills? Did the President ever suggest or recommend the passage of any bill or measure for the relief of the soldier? "I pause for a reply."

I should be pleased if some great statesman would inform me where the difference is between a private bill for a pension and a general pension law, so far as it relates to the power of Congress in making such enactments. Why should the President hold that the general law controlled all subsequent legislation? Surely Congress has power to pass either, and complaint can not be made because the later law differs from a statute formerly enacted. The President seems to treat the general pension law as a Constitution, and annuls by its force all subsequent minor acts that do not conform to it.

I have but a few more words to say in regard to the extraordinary speech of my colleague. It is evident on its face that it was not made to be heard in this House; and it was not. Between the lines it has the ring of "stump oratory," as though it had been manufactured for that purpose. It will not be misunderstood by any one who takes the trouble to read it. No difference now whether its publication was regular or irregular; it is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Sunday and can be transmitted by mail under his frank to all his constituency, and unanswered it is a pretty good electioneering document.

There are some seeming inconsistencies in my colleague's remarks and different bills that I do not fully understand.

He admits that a universal pension bill "is fast approaching and will soon become a law." Why not now? Will there ever be a better time? In his pauper bill (No. 1329), which I ask to be printed with my remarks, he allows pensions only to those who are incapacited from the perfomance of any manual labor and who are dependent on public charity for their sustenance and $8 per month; but to accommodate all, in the bill reported by him from his committee as a substitute for the Senate bill he cuts down the pension to a cent a day for services performed!

He admits that with the grand surplus in the Treasury we could easily pay all the arrearages of our ex-soldiers; yet during all these months his party, or he himself, has failed to procure any days for the consideration in this House of any of the more important bills that have been referred to his committee. It is strange how badly he, or we, have been treated; but facts are stubborn things. His committee has had more bills referred to it than all the other committees combined. They have nearly all had their days set apart to them, but he has had none for general pension legislation. The ex-soldiers seem to have no rights that this House is bound to respect.

Mr. Chairman, a grand panorama seems passing before me. There are nearly one million men in the column. They look worn and thoughtful, and prematurely old. Many of them are poorly clad, and some are in tatters. About twenty thousand have fallen by the wayside and carried to the poor-houses. Some are armless, some on crutches, some emaciated, and writhing with wounds long since received in battle and which are still running and unhealed! But few of the great mass seem prosperous, for all have passed through that ordeal which leaves poverty behind it. Still they march forward with heads erect. Their step is the proud measured step of the soldier. There is still pride in their bearing, for they know they are the remnant of that band of heroes who saved our nation from ruin and wreck.

Mr. Chairman, these are the men whose petitions by hundreds of thousands remain in our archives unread. These are the men whose just prayers are unheeded and unanswered by the nation they have saved! [Applause.]

EXHIBIT A.—HON. C. C. MATSON'S PAUPER BILL.

A bill for the relief of honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who are now disabled and dependent upon charity for a sustenance.

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons who have served one year or more in the military or naval service of the United States, in any war in which the United States has been engaged, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now, or who may hereafter be, suffering from mental or physical disability not the result of their own vicious habits or gross carelessness, and which incapacitates them for the performance of any manual labor, and who are dependent upon public charity for their sustenance, shall, upon making due proof of these facts, according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive $8 per month; and such pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Pension Office, upon proof that the disability then existed, and continue during the existence of the same on the degree herein provided: Provided, That persons who are now receiving pensions under existing laws, or whose claims are pending in the Pension Office, may, by application to the Commissioner of Pensions, in such forms as he may prescribe, receive the benefits of this act; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to allow more than one pension at the same time to the same person: And provided further, That rank in the service shall not be considered in applications filed under this act.

Mr. CHEADLE (when the hammer fell during the delivery of the foregoing remarks) said: I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] is recognized.

Mr. HOVEY. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to continue and complete my remarks. I want about thirty minutes. We have been meeting here day after day for eight months, and I have listened to all of you, and now I desire an opportunity to retain the floor while I conclude my remarks.

Mr. BURNES. I will yield ten minutes further.

Mr. HOVEY continued his remarks for ten minutes, when the following proceedings took place:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask that unanimous consent be accorded the distinguished member from Indiana to conclude his remarks. I hope the House will grant this favor, as the gentleman is making an interesting speech on an important question at a very interesting time.

Mr. BURNES. How much additional time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HOVEY. About thirty minutes.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for fifteen minutes, and that fifteen minutes be reserved for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to reply.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not ask more than five minutes.

There was no objection; and the request of Mr. BURNES was agreed to.

Mr. HOVEY resumed his remarks, and at the expiration of the fifteen minutes the following took place:

Mr. BURNES. I have a proposition to make which I think will be acceptable to my friend from Indiana. He has now occupied the greater part of an hour, and, in deference to his distinction and his merit as a soldier and a statesman, I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to go on and finish his speech, and that we on this side shall have a like time to reply.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HOVEY resumed and concluded his remarks.

Mr. BURNES. I now yield the floor to my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY].

Mr. HOLMAN. Before my friend from New Hampshire begins I ask him to give me five minutes to say a few words in reply to my colleague who has just taken his seat.

Mr. MCKINNEY. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was not present during the first part of my colleague's [Mr. HOVEY'S] remarks; but I understand that he referred to a bill introduced by him granting bounty lands to the soldiers of the Union Army which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and that he complained that that bill had not been reported back. Is that correct?

Mr. HOVEY. I so understand the facts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was that your statement?

Mr. HOVEY. That is my understanding.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then in reply to my colleague I wish to call attention to the history of the efforts at bounty-land legislation since the beginning of the late war, and to show who is to blame for the failure to secure bounty lands to the soldiers of the Union Army. On the 18th day of December, 1861, almost at the beginning of the late war, when the homestead bill was pending which ultimately became the homestead law, I offered an amendment to the bill providing for extending to the soldiers of the then existing war the provisions of the act of March 3, 1855, which had granted or enlarged the grants of bounty lands to all the soldiers of the preceding wars.

That proposition was in the following words:

And be it further enacted, That the provision of an act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1855, shall extend to and be construed to embrace the officers, soldiers, and seamen who have been engaged in the military or naval service of the United States since the 12th day of April, 1861, or who shall be engaged in such service during the present war: Provided, however, That no officer, soldier, or seaman shall be entitled to the benefit of said act unless he shall have been engaged in the service aforesaid for a period of not less than sixty days, or been honorably discharged on account of wounds received or sickness incurred while in the line of his duty in such service: Provided further, That the widows and children of officers, soldiers, and seamen who shall die from wounds received or sickness incurred while in the service of the United States, as aforesaid, shall be entitled to the benefits of said act. And this act, except this section, shall not go into operation for the period of one year after the close of the war in which we are engaged.

In a House overwhelmingly Republican that proposition was defeated, and it was defeated upon the express ground, as I have heretofore stated in this House, and as is shown by the debate on the proposition, that the tendency of the measure was to monopolize the public lands through large purchases of the bounty land warrants. The homestead law was approved finally on the 20th of May, 1862, and although that argument of the monopolizing tendency of the bounty land policy was accepted as a reason sufficient for the action of the House in defeating my proposition, the policy of making grants of public lands to corporations was immediately entered upon, the great grant to the Union Pacific system of corporations of 28,000,400 acres of land being made on the 1st day of July, 1862, when the amount of those grants had reached more than one hundred and eighty-one millions of acres of the most fertile lands of the public domain. I again, on the 12th day of December, 1872, brought forward a bill granting bounty lands to the soldiers of the Union Army, as follows:

A bill to enable honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, their widows and orphan children, to acquire homesteads on the public lands of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That every private soldier, musician, and officer who served in the Army of the United States, during the late war, for ninety days, and was honorably discharged, including the troops mustered into the service of the United States by virtue of the third section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for completing the defenses of Washington, and for other purposes," approved February 13, 1862, and every seaman, marine, and officer, and other person who served in the Navy of the United States or in the Marine Corps, during the late war, for ninety days, and who was honorably discharged, and the widow of any such soldier, musician, seaman, or officer, or if there be no such widow his orphan children under twenty-one years of age shall be entitled to enter a quantity of public lands (not mineral) not exceeding 160 acres or one quarter-section, which shall be composed of contiguous tracts, according to legal subdivisions, including the alternate reserved sections of public lands along the line of any railroad or other public work, or other lands subject to entry under the homestead law of the United States, and receive a certificate of such entry without payment of any Government fees.

SEC. 2. That such entry shall be made in the name of the person entitled as above to make the same by application in person, or by agent, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe; and the patent for the land so entered shall be issued only to such soldier, musician, seaman, or officer, or to his widow or orphan children, provided for in the first section of this act, who made the entry; but no sale of such land, or of any interest therein, or power of attorney authorizing such sale, or other contract or agreement in anywise affecting or concerning any such land, made, executed, or entered into prior to the issuing of the patent therefor and the actual delivery of the same to the person to whom issued, shall be of any effect whatever, but every such sale, power of attorney, contract, or agreement shall be null and void.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe rules and regulations to carry the several provisions of this act into effect.

This bill passed the House on the 12th day of December, 1872, on a yea-and-nay vote—yeas 118, nays 54; but the recognized leaders of the Republican side of the House voted against it, including Mr. Coburn, Mr. Dunnell, Mr. Garfield, Mr. HOAR, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. KELLEY, Mr. Roberts, Mr. Sargent, Mr. Twichell, Mr. William A. Wheeler, and others equally prominent. It was not a party vote, for many Republicans voted for it and some Democrats against it. Of the gentlemen now members of this House Mr. BUTLER, Mr. COX, Mr. RANDALL, and myself voted for it; Mr. KELLEY against it.

I placed the measure upon two grounds: first, as an act of justice to the soldiers of the Union Army; and second, as a means of resisting and counteracting the alarming policy which was then in progress of granting away the public domain to corporations. That measure passed the House, but it passed against the opposition of leading Republican members. It went to the Senate, and was sent to the Committee on Public Lands, from which it was reported adversely by Mr. STEWART, of that committee; and it was indefinitely postponed, or at least it was never heard from again.

The following is the beginning of the report made on this bill to the Senate on the 12th day February, 1873, after full deliberation, for, as I have stated, it passed the House on the 12th of December, 1872. The soldiers of the whole country in overwhelming numbers petitioned the Senate to pass it, yet in a Senate overwhelmingly Republican not one word was spoken in its support. But the following is the beginning of the report, which sufficiently indicates its character:

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1665), to enable honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, their widows, and orphan children, to acquire homesteads on the public land of the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

The report proceeds as follows:

That this bill, if enacted into a law, would provide for the disposition of at least 320,000,000 of acres of selected public lands. That the whole area of the public domain, exclusive of Alaska, is less than one thousand millions of acres. From this must be deducted as valueless or unsuitable for settlement or reserved by law for other purposes, the lakes, the swamp-land grant of 1850, the railroad grants yet unpatented, the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of each township granted for common schools, the Indian Territory and other reservations for the Indians, the mineral lands, the uninhabitable mountains, the alkali deserts, and all other waste lands.

These deductions are variously estimated at from two-thirds to three-fourths of the whole amount of the public domain, or from 666,000,000 to 750,000,000 of acres. This would leave from two hundred and fifty to two hundred and thirty-four million acres of public lands fit to be occupied by settlers. The highest, and probably a very exaggerated, estimate of the amount of such lands is 400,000,000 of acres. If the 320,000,000 of acres required to satisfy the terms of the bill under consideration could be found, exclusive of the necessary deduction above noted, all reasonable expectations would be answered. A minute discussion of the amount of the arable lands in the public domain is, however, unnecessary. It is quite evident that most if not all the public lands suitable for cultivation would be required to satisfy the terms of the bill, and there would be a strong probability that those who were unfortunate enough to be last would find no lands to enter.

And so ended the second and last attempt to secure to the soldiers of the Union Army a freehold in the land of their country in conformity to a traditional policy which was unbroken from 1787 down to the period when the party of my distinguished colleague came into power.

The first measure, that of 1861'-62, was defeated because, in the opinion of the Republican leaders, it would tend to monopoly; the second, that of 1871-'72, was defeated because there was not land enough to secure the soldiers their freeholds. But, strange enough, between those two periods the same party as represented in Congress had granted away the following lands:

	Acres.
To States for railroad corporations	17,775,624
To railroad corporations direct	163,643,944
Grand total	181,419,568

Now, sir, that 181,419,568 acres thus given over to a most wicked and infamous monopoly includes the most choice tracts of your public lands, the most fertile parts of your once great public domain extending from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, selected with care by the skillful agents of the corporations to whom they were so generously granted. And granted too by Congress and by the leaders of a party that could not think of granting lands to the Union soldiers for fear of monopoly!

And now, sir, after sixteen years have elapsed since that adverse report was made to the Senate, after 181,419,568 acres of the very cream of your public domain, a territory more than eight times as large as the good State of Indiana, have been given by Republican Congresses to a few elegant gentlemen who made money out of the war instead of Union soldiers who imperiled their lives in upholding the Union, and the widows and orphans of those who fell in battle—after sixteen years, during which, under the pre-emption law and other laws, your public domain has been left exposed to a most infamous system of land piracy and monopoly by which vast portions of the lands which should have been the homes of your Union soldiers and laboring people, have been seized upon and appropriated by great capital interests, and are placed forever beyond their reach.

And all this under the pre-emption and other laws, which a succession of Houses of Representatives under Democratic control have earnestly sought to repeal, and thus secure the remaining lands for homes for your people under the homestead law, without as yet securing the co-operation of the Senate, while the monopoly of the little that remains of valuable public land still goes on, with only here and there a fragment of the magnificent public domain which existed on the 4th day of March, 1861, when the Republican party came into power, left within the reach of the workmen of this country—a domain which, husbanded with the wisdom, prudence, and patriotism displayed by all former parties from 1787 down to March 4, 1861, would have secured free homes to our landless people for a century to come.

With all this and after all of this, with a mere remnant of the public domain adapted to agriculture left, with this record before the country a gentleman on that side of the House gravely proposes that Congress shall grant bounty lands to the Union soldiers! What a patriotic policy! Give to corporations and monopoly, to capitalists of Europe and America, to English and Scottish Lords, the grand domain of your fertile lands, and to the soldiers of the Union Army your barren wastes, sterile mountains, and the ice fields of Alaska! No one can be deluded or deceived by this. All men know, and none better than the soldiers of the Union Army, that the lands which ought to have been theirs according to the traditional policy of the Republic—the millions of acres which ought to have been the freeholds of the men who defended the Union in the hour of its deadly peril, the homes of those whose labor creates and upholds the public wealth—have been given by Congress to corporations and monopoly, and are now enlarging imperial private estates. Restore to your public domain the vast millions of acres of fertile lands you have given to corporations and surrendered to monopoly, and then justice can be done to the Union soldier who imperiled his life for the Union, to the widow and orphan whose husband and father fell on the field of honor in defense of his country.

My own record shows how gladly I would aid in securing such result.

Mr. MCKINNEY was recognized.

Mr. HOVEY. Mr. Chairman, one word——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire is recognized.

Mr. HOVEY. Can I not be allowed to reply to my colleague?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOVEY. I want a minute in reply to show how fallacious all that he has said is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will have a minute to reply.

Mr. HOVEY. I want to say this——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY] has been recognized.

Mr. MCKINNEY. How much time does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOVEY] want?

Mr. HOVEY. A minute or a minute and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOVEY] occupying one minute.

Mr. HOVEY. Mr. Chairman, it is not important to me what the past legislation of this House has been. I stand here for my constituency; I demand justice for the soldiers who fought beside me, and I want them to have the same rights their fathers had. What rights had their fathers in regard to public lands? Why, sir, down to the war of 1861, every soldier who had served one day in battle or fourteen days in the Army of the United States was entitled to 160 acres of land. My colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] says we have no land; we have an area of public land more than thirty-five times as large as the State of Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not say we had no land. I said we had only 75,000,000 acres available for agriculture, without irrigation.

Mr. HOVEY. If you will not give the soldiers bread, give them at least the stones; give them your rocks and your mountains. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I wish to append to my remarks a table in regard to the extent of our public domain:

THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 13, 1888.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, relative to certain statistics relating to the public lands, and in reply thereto herewith inclose a table showing the estimated area of the public domain disposed of, and the estimated area remaining to June 30, 1887.

Under date of April 9, I transmitted you a statement giving the area of the public lands surveyed and the estimated area unsurveyed to June 30, 1887.

Very respectfully,

S. M. STOCKSLAGER,
Commissioner.

Hon. A. P. HOVEY,
House of Representatives.

DIVISION OF ACCOUNTS, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, April 9, 1888.

Mr. HOLMAN. You have given all the lands to corporations, and now you propose to give the "stones" to the soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY] is recognized for thirty-five minutes.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Am I not allowed more time than that?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOVEY] occupied forty minutes, and a like time was granted to the side on the right of the Chair. The gentleman from New Hampshire yielded five minutes of that time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. MCKINNEY. I was not aware of that arrangement or I would not have yielded.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What measure is now under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman desires the Clerk will read the title of the pending bill. Unless unanimous consent is given for an extension of time, the Chair can not recognize the gentleman from New Hampshire for more than thirty-five minutes.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is with some degree of diffidence that I rise in this House to speak upon a subject that may not be considered germane to the question before us for consideration at this time; but I feel that it devolves upon some member on this side to answer the statements that have been made in the Halls of Congress and throughout the country that the Democratic party and the present Administration is unfriendly to the Union soldier, who in the hour of peril to the Union and the old flag went forth as brave men in defense of that which had been left them by their fathers as the richest legacy that can come to any generation—a united country and a free people.

I am not here to-day as an apologist for my party; I am only here to state the facts as they exist, and to show to the people of this country that the Democratic party is true to those who fought the country's battles, and that during the three full years that the present Administration has been in power, the Union soldiers have received greater consideration than they ever received in a like period during the twenty years of Republican administration after the war was over. Every Republican upon this floor and every intelligent man in the country knows this to be true; but for mere partisan purposes they have perverted the facts, and sent broadcast through the land the statement that the present Administration and the party that supports it is the enemy of the Union soldier. A simple investigation of the pension-rolls will show how false this statement is.

In order that we may make the comparison most just to the Republican party we will compare the last three years of the Republican administration with the three full years of the Democratic administration.

The annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the fiscal years 1883, 1884, and 1885 show certificates issued as follows:

Original	108,121
Increase	79,248
Miscellaneous	3,852
Total claims admitted during the last three years of Republican rule	191,221

The records of the Pension Bureau for the fiscal years 1886, 1887, and 1888 show certificates issued as follows during these years:

Original	156,226
Increase	181,173
Miscellaneous	22,055
Total claims admitted during first three years of Democratic administration	359,454
Excess of certificates issued under Democratic administration	168,233
Net increase to pension-rolls during the last three fiscal years of Arthur's administration	59,428
Net increase to pension-rolls during first three fiscal years of Democratic administration	104,875
Excess of net increase under Democratic administration	45,447

FUNDS DISBURSED.

During the last three years of Republican rule	$183,399,216.31
During three years of Democratic administration	217,399,757.30
Excess of disbursements by Democratic administration	34,000,541.01
New names added to the pension-rolls during last three years of Republican administration	92,215
First three years of Democratic administration	172,132
Excess of new names added by Democrats	79,917

This does not indicate that the soldiers have suffered under Democratic administration of the Pension Bureau. With no increase of force in the Department, but with a decrease, without superior opportunity for collecting evidence, the administration of General Black has shown almost 100 per cent. of increase of work performed and of certificates issued. The work of the Department has been brought up to date; old claims have been disposed of; and the bureau is now doing current work, and every claim is assured of prompt consideration when the claimant presents the necessary evidence required by law. If we will turn to the workings of the special examiners' division we will find the comparison equally favorable to the present administration.

Mr. KERR. Do you not recognize a necessity for additional pension legislation?

Mr. MCKINNEY. We will talk about that hereafter.

Mr. KERR. Why not now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire declines to yield.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Unanimous consent has been given to the gentleman more than forty times to talk as he pleased.

Mr. KERR. Never once.

Mr. MCKINNEY. I propose to occupy my own time.

We make the comparison between the years 1884 and 1885, under Commissioner Dudley, with the years 1886 and 1887, under Commissioner Black. The reason for not comparing with the three full years is because the report of the Commissioner for 1888 is not yet complete.

For 1884:
Examiners in field	351
Cases investigated	7,452
Reports made	2,187
Depositions taken	18,484
For 1885:
Examiners in field	308
Cases investigated	9,831
Reports made	29,224
Depositions taken	189,743
Credibility reports	23,623

Expense account for the two years, $514,269.18. Of this sum $343,551 was charged as traveling expenses; average cost of investigating, $52.31 per case.

UNDER DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION.

For 1886:
Examiners in field	277
Cases investigated	12,715
Reports made	29,395
Depositions taken	171,380
Credibility reports	23,246
For 1887:
Examiners in field	253
Cases investigated	31,010
Reports made	26,399
Depositions taken	140,544
Credibility reports	33,192

Total expenses for two years, $427,404, of which sum $153,180.20 was charged for traveling expenses. Average cost of investigation, $13.78 per case.

This work was done with an average force of sixty-four examiners less than were employed by Mr. Dudley. The result was the investigation under Mr. Black of 43,725 cases as against 17,283 cases under Mr. Dudley, a saving in traveling expenses alone of $190,271; a saving in total expense account to the Government of $86,865; a saving in each case investigated of $38.53. In other words, it costs under the present administration only 26½ per cent. as much to investigate a special case as it did under Mr. Dudley. It seems to me that every honest man must admit by this comparison that both the soldier and the Treasury have been greatly benefited by a Democratic administration, as compared with the administration preceding it. I heard two Republicans now on this floor make the statement that every facility was offered under the present Commissioner for a speedy adjudication of pension claims. One of the best friends of the soldier in the United States Senate, a Republican, told me that during the fourteen years he had been in Congress, the Pension Bureau had never been in so good condition, nor the ruling of the Department so liberal and just to the soldier as it is under General Black.

If we will turn to the record of appointments under the present administration of the Pension Bureau we will find the comparison is not to the glory of the Republican party. Of 416 appointments made by General Black from March 17, 1885, to June 30, 1887, 230 were soldiers or soldiers' kindred, and 186 were civilians—a net difference in favor of soldiers of 44, or about 24 per cent. General Black has appointed 29 ex-Union soldiers in excess of the total number dropped from the rolls by death, discharge, resignation, or otherwise; and this with 150 employés less than were on the rolls during the fiscal years of the previous administration would make a net difference in favor of the soldier of 179, or about 12 per cent. more soldiers, sailors, or their widows and kindred upon the pay-rolls than were ever upon the rolls in the history of the office. Three hundred and seventy soldiers or their kindred occupy the higher positions in the bureau, paying $1,200 a year and upwards, against 292 civilians—a difference in favor of the soldier of 27 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party can well afford to go to the country with this record, and it will only be by a false representation of the facts that the ex-Union soldiers will fail to see their true interests and recognize who are their true friends. There will be no extra force of examiners sent into the doubtful States between now and election to promise pensions in return for votes; neither will the examining boards be overrun with soldiers ordered for examination in order that our party under a false pretense may capture the votes of the veterans; but we will present to them the simple facts and figures, and trust to their intelligence and loyalty to cast their votes as may seem best to them for their own interests and the interest of the Government their loyalty helped to save.

But the Republicans will say, Oh, General Black is all right; we find no fault with the administration of the Pension Bureau; but it is the President himself that we find fault with; we believe he is not the friend of the Union soldier. Now in order that we may know if this be true, let us examine his record upon this question, and if he has proven himself the enemy of the Union soldier. we will all join our forces in condemnation of him and his administration.

We can only judge of a man's character by his daily life. We judge of a man's sentiments regarding any question before him by his treatment of that question. President Cleveland has had ample opportunity to show his feelings toward Union soldiers, and we have no hesitancy in placing his record before the country as a representative of the Democratic party. Had he been opposed to further pensioning the soldiers he would have vetoed the pension legislation that has passed Congress since he has been President. Yet what are the facts? On March 19, 1886, there was an act passed increasing widows' pension from $8 to $12 per month. The benefits of this bill applied to 102,568 widows, and amounts to $4,923,264. President Cleveland signed the bill. He approved the act of August 4, 1886, which increased the pension of 10,092 pensioners to the amount of $1,089,936. He approved the act of January 29, 1887, known as the Mexican war pension bill, applying to 21,704 pensioners, amounting to $2,083,584. He approved the act of June 7, 1888, granting arrears of pensions to widows from the date of their husbands' death, estimated to apply to 10,000 widows, averaging $108 each, amounting to $1,080,000. Total benefits of these acts applying to 144,364 pensioners of $9,176,784.

This does not indicate that the President is opposed to pensioning soldiers and their widows. He has never vetoed but a single general pension law, and that was the bill known as the dependent pension bill. It is not necessary for me to attempt here to defend that veto. It has been defended largely by the soldiers themselves; many Grand Army posts have commended the act. The leading Republican papers all over the country have commended the veto, and you will find but few of any party who defend the bill as it was passed, or who criticise the President for exercising the veto power in its disapproval. In his veto of this bill he calls the attention of Congress to the fact that statutes which, like pension laws, should be liberally administered as measures of benevolence in behalf of worthy beneficiaries, should admit of no uncertainty as to their general object and consequences. He then shows most clearly that there would be great doubt about the interpretation of the language of the bill, whether it was meant to apply only to those who were wholly unable to earn their support by labor, or whether it applied to all who were in any degree mentally or physically disabled, thus including the thousands who are receiving already a pension below the $12 a month contemplated in the bill.

The chairman of the Committee on Pensions in the House claimed there was no provision for pensioning any one who has a less disability than a total inability to labor, and that it was a charity measure. The chairman of the committee in the Senate dissented from this construction of the bill, and declared that it embraced all soldiers who are disabled to any considerable extent. Others held the same view of the bill. If this construction of the bill was correct, the result would have been entirely different from the purpose of those who framed it. There is not a single sentence in that veto message that casts an unkind reflection upon the soldier in any way. On the contrary, he expresses sympathy with them, and only withheld his signature on the ground that the bill was not explicit in its terms and would fail to accomplish the object aimed at by its promoters. I here insert extracts from leading Republican papers of the country, commendatory of the President's veto, and will append more fully in the RECORD:

President Cleveland's reasons for declining to approve the dependent-pension bill are sound and sufficient.—Worcester (Mass.) Spy.

This is an entirely new departure in the matter of pensions (except where many years have intervened), and one which does not receive the approval of the majority of the veterans of the war or of the public generally.—Hartford Courant.

President Cleveland is entitled to credit and thanks for the manly and sensible stand he has taken, and we are sure the country will applaud and sustain him in it.—Albany Express.

The veto will be generally approved by public sentiment throughout the country. For the position finally taken he deserves credit, and it will be freely extended to him on every hand.—Troy Times.

Undoubtedly the country is with him.—Buffalo Express.

The country is with him in reprobating the present tendency of Congress to pension extravagance. The President's veto, being sanctioned by the country, will probably operate as a check to this form of extravagance, and prove in consequence a great public service.—Philadelphia Press.

President Cleveland's veto of the pauper pension bill will be generally approved.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

In vetoing the pauper pension bill the President has performed a brave and worthy act.—Philadelphia Enquirer.

In common fairness and justice to the President we must heartily commend his action.—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

The President did well to veto it.—Wheeling Intelligencer.

The objection to the bill was that it opened the door for vast abuses. The way these could come to pass is strongly stated by the President.—Cincinnati Commercial.

It was a courageous act for Mr. Cleveland to face the demagogues in Congress with a veto of a general outdoor relief pension bill, but he has done it without hesitation, and justified himself at every point.—Chicago Tribune.

That was a good place for a veto. Public sentiment will sustain this act of the Executive.—Minneapolis Journal.

Senator QUAY, chairman of the Republican national committee, in the Philadelphia Bulletin of February 19, 1887, said:

The men who did the actual fighting and have some pride in their record resent the idea of being pauperized. That veto message is the best thing that President Cleveland has set his hand to, and if I were in the Senate now I would vote to sustain it.

As I said before, it is unnecessary for me here to defend this act of the President. It is sanctioned by the people of this country, and will never be used against him except by those whose partisanship is stronger than their patriotism.

Again, the President is charged with unfriendliness to the soldier because of his vetoes of private pension bills. Let us investigate his conduct in this regard and see whether he has been less just to the soldiers than he ought to have been under the circumstances.

PRIVATE PENSION BILLS.

The number of private pension bills approved by President Cleveland, or allowed to become laws by him by limitation, to July 24, 1888, were 1,264.

The number of private pension bills approved or allowed to become laws by limitation during the entire period of Republican administration were 1,524, or only 260 more in twenty years after the war than President Cleveland has approved in three years and five months. There is a little doubt that before the present Congress adjourns President Cleveland will have approved more private pension bills than all the Republican Presidents from Lincoln to Arthur.

Private pension bills approved by—
President Grant	485
President Hayes	303
President Arthur	736
President Cleveland	1,264
Average per year under—
Grant	60
Hayes	75
Arthur	184
Cleveland	360

During President Cleveland's administration he has vetoed of private pension bills 199; bills failed for want of signature, 55. And for this he is called the enemy of the Union soldier—a strange way to show his enmity. Had he desired to show his opposition to pensioning soldiers how much better he could have done it by vetoing the 1,264 and allowing the 199 to pass.

I do not believe there is a single Representative on this floor that believes the President has selected these 199 soldiers and soldiers' widows in order that he might show his opposition or contempt for the Union soldier; nor is there a Representative who would dare risk his reputation before the country on such a statement. The President's only thought has been justice to the worthy soldiers who did honest service for the country and who are justly entitled to recognition from the Government. He has freely expressed himself in his veto messages as desiring to show every consideration to those who are justly entitled to a pension, but he has refused to approve pensions for those who have utterly failed to show any connection between their present disabilities and their army service. In this he has been just to those who are deserving.

There is not a member here who does not know that if the President had not given more attention to the bills passed by this House and the Senate than the House and the Senate gave them, great injustice would have been done in many cases. Twice during this present Congress has he received bills the second time for his signature. He has vetoed seven bills passed by Congress where the pensioner was already receiving a larger pension granted by the Pension Bureau than the bill passed by Congress called for. He has vetoed bills that were passed for the relief of soldiers, because on examination of the evidence on file in the Department he was convinced that the soldier would receive justice through the Department and be entitled to arrearages which he would lose by the special act. The veto of Senate bill 7540 saved to the beneficiary $5,760. The veto of Senate bill 1067 saved to the beneficiary $1,074. These amounts were paid to them shortly after the veto through the Pension Office.

Another of the same kind has been adjudicated by the Department, and the soldier is now receiving $50 per month. Four bills were vetoed on the ground of desertion and dishonorable discharge; on the same grounds General Grant vetoed nine special acts, all of this nature that came before him. Seventeen special acts were vetoed because the applicants were not in the military service at the time of the incurrence of the disability for which relief was asked. On the same grounds President Grant vetoed two private acts, all that came before him of this character. Ten were vetoed because the claimant is now receiving pension commensurate with the degree of disability found to exist on examination by a competent board of surgeons. President Grant vetoed three private acts for the same cause, all that came before him of this nature.

A few days ago the President vetoed a private act because the applicant had deserted the Union forces on capture by the Confederates, and served nine months in the Confederate army before recapture. This bill was presented by a Republican friend of the soldier, and is the first attempt to pension those who served in the Confederate army. Yet the Republican party calls President Cleveland an enemy of the Union soldiers for his vetoes; but President Grant, though guilty of the same acts, and for the same cause, was a patriot and a friend of the soldier. Consistency, thou art indeed a jewel; but never found in the Republican party. President Cleveland discovered that under all previous administrations the consular officers of the Government abroad had charged our pensioners now residing abroad for verifying their papers. He thereupon issued an order directing that such service should be rendered them free of charge.

These statements alone are sufficient to prove to every honest citizen of this country that President Cleveland has shown more true love for the honest soldier by his careful consideration of their rights than has Congress by its ill-considered and ill-advised legislation for those who could not prove their claim. A Senator said a few days ago, in discussing the President's vetoes, that after the House and Senate had investigated a claim and passed upon it, it was preposterous for the President to set up his judgment against it. Now, that Senator knows, and the members of this House know, that in the average pension claim there is never any investigation either by the House or by the Senate; and I do not believe they are thoroughly investigated by the Pension Committee.

It would be impossible for the committee as a body to investigate every claim. Each case is referred to a subcommittee of one, and I think the committee will not deny that they usually accept the report of the subcommittee. In a single sitting of seventy minutes the Senate has passed one hundred and forty-seven private pension bills. What consideration did these bills receive by the members of that body when they were passing them at the rate of more than two a minute? In this House every Friday night we pass from thirty to forty private bills, and unless the bill calls for a larger sum than is allowed in such cases by law, there is seldom any discussion upon them. Each member present is satisfied to let the others pass if he can get his own bill through. I yield to no man in a desire to do exact justice to every deserving Union soldier, and where there is a doubt I would always resolve that doubt in favor of him who loyally defended the Union.

But I confess, with some degree of shame, that too often here we act the part of cowards instead of the part of statesmen; and it ill becomes us to criticise the President for exercising his prerogative as the Constitution which he has sworn to uphold directs. As gooda man as there is on the Invalid Pension Committee in this House, and a Republican, said to me that in nine cases in ten the President is right in his veto; that many bills are allowed to pass without sufficient evidence. If, according to his statement, the President is right nine times where Congress is right once, then he can well afford to go to the country on his record; and on these grounds I am willing to advocate him as the true friend of the true soldier.

SOLDIERS IN OFFICE.

President Cleveland has not been unmindful of the soldier in the appointments he has made. Of the seventeen pension agents appointed by President Cleveland, sixteen were soldiers in the Union Army, and the seventeenth, Mrs. M. A. Mulligan, is the widow of a distinguished Federal soldier who was killed in battle. Mr. S. L. Wilson, the eighteenth pension agent, appointed by President Arthur, who lost both legs at the battle of Gettysburgh, has been continued in office by the present Administration. Thus every dollar of the nearly $80,000,000 that is distributed each year to soldiers by the Government passes through the hands of veterans who defended the Union.

The following is the list of some of the Union soldiers that President Cleveland has appointed to office: General Rosecrans, General Corse, General Sigel, General Black, General Bragg, General Buell, General McMahon, General Franklin, General Davis, General Bartlett, Colonel McLean, and Colonel Denby, and hundreds of others who have been appointed as postmasters and to fill offices in various departments of the Government; and I stand here to assert that there never was a time in the history of the Government since the war when there were more soldiers employed in the service than now. The charge is made that soldiers have been discharged from office. That is true in some cases; but Democratic soldiers have been appointed instead. A man who did his duty in the Army, but who because of his conviction of right voted the Democratic ticket since the war closed, never received any recognition from the Republican party. Oh, no; they were allies of the Confederacy.

Is it anything wrong that when the Democrats came into power the Democratic soldier should have recognition? There are hundreds of Republican soldiers in the service now who have been kept there by this Administration. Will some Republican please give to the country a list of Democratic soldiers who were in the service under Republican administration. It would be excellent reading during the coming campaign. This Administration has in every way shown its kindly feelings toward the ex-Union soldier by granting pensions to those who were deserving and by appointing them to positions of honor and trust; and any attempt to bring discredit upon the Administration or the party it represents because of its unfriendly attitude toward the soldier will utterly fail when the records of its acts are made known to the people.

RETURN OF REBEL FLAGS.

One other sin this Administration is charged with, and that is the attempt to return the Confederate flags to the States in which the organizations belonged from which they were captured. I deem it wise here to submit the action of the President in that matter and the correspondence which took place between Adjutant-General Drum, the Secretary of War, and the President, that the people may know that the scheme was conceived in the mind of a Republican, that it never had executive action in its favor, and that the only return of Confedate flags by the Government took place under a Republican administration. In April, 1887, the Adjutant-General of the Army, an appointee of President Hayes, whose tenure is fixed by law, wearing the button of the Grand Army of the Republic, addressed a letter to the Secretary of War in which he suggested the propriety of returning all flags, Union and Confederate, to the authorities of the respective States in which the regiments which bore these colors were organized, for such final disposition as they may determine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What Republican does the gentleman from New Hampshire refer to?

Mr. McKINNEY. General Drum.

Mr. BOUTELLE. General Drum is a good Republican, you say?

Mr. McKINNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You are sure about that?

Mr. McKINNEY. Yes, sir, I am quite sure of it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Are you as sure of the fact in question as of his Republicanism?

Mr. McKINNEY. I am sure that General Drum first suggested the return of these flags in a letter to the Secretary of War; and if he is not a Republican I would like the gentleman to show the reason why.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman also said, I believe, that the only flags returned to Confederates were returned by Republicans?

Mr. McKINNEY. I do say so.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I undertake to say that no flag was ever returned by any Republican official to any person connected with the late Confederacy.

Mr. McKINNEY. This proposition was never discussed by the Cabinet, and no formal action was ever taken on it, or any order signed by the President. It was, however, submitted to him with other routine matter, and approved in a perfunctory way, on the statement that such action had been customary in the Department under previous administrations. General Drum's letter was as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 30, 1887.

SIR: I have the honor to state that there are now in this office (stored in one of the attic rooms of the building) a number of Union flags captured in action but recovered on the fall of the Confederacy and forwarded to the War Department for safekeeping, together with a number of Confederate flags which the fortunes of war placed in our hands during the late civil war.

While in the past favorable action has been taken on applications properly supported for the return of Union flags to organizations representing the survivors of the military regiment in the service of the Government, I beg to submit that it would be a graceful act to anticipate future requests of this nature, and venture to suggest the propriety of returning all the flags, Union and Confederate, to the authorities of the respective States in which the regiments which bore these colors were organized, for such final disposition as they may determine. While in all the civilized nations of the world trophies taken in the war against foreign enemies have been carefully preserved and exhibited as proud mementoes of the nation's military glories, wise and obvious reasons have always excepted from the rule evidences of past internecine troubles which by appeal to the arbitrament of the sword have disturbed the peaceful march of a people to its destiny.

Over twenty years have elapsed since the termination of the late civil war. Many of the prominent leaders, civil and military, of the late Confederate States are now honored representatives of the people in the national councils, or in other eminent positions lend the aid of their talents to the wise administration of the affairs of the whole country, and the people of the several States composing the Union are now united, treading the broader roads to a glorious future.

Impressed with these views, I have the honor to submit the suggestions made in this letter for the careful consideration it will receive at your hands.

Very truly, yours,

R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

Hon. WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

General Drum therefore wrote letters to the governors of all the States offering the return of such flags; but before any of the flags were sent or delivered, the President gave further consideration to the matter, and wrote the following letter to the Secretary of War:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, June 16, 1887.

I have to-day considered with more care than when the subject was orally presented me, the action of your Department directing letters to be addressed to the governors of all the States offering to return, if desired, to the loyal States the flags captured in the war of the rebellion by the Confederate forces, and afterwards recovered by Government troops, and to the Confederate States the flags captured by the Union forces, all of which have been packed in boxes and stored in the cellar and attic of the War Department.

I am of the opinion that the return of these flags in the manner thus contemplated is not authorized by existing law nor justified as an executive act.

I request, therefore, that no further steps be taken in the matter, except to examine and inventory these flags and adopt proper measures for their preservation. Any direction as to final disposition of them should originate with Congress.

Yours, truly,

GROVER CLEVELAND.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

The fact, therefore, is that under this Administration not a single rebel flag has been returned or given up. I do not stop to read the correspondence; it will be found in the RECORD——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like the gentleman to elaborate that point.

Mr. McKINNEY. Read it, if you want to, in the RECORD; you will have plenty of time to read it. I want to finish my speech.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understood the gentleman to say he was giving the facts. Now, I would like to hear them.

Mr. McKINNEY. I will make my speech; and if the gentleman wants to reply, he will have time to do so if he gets the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I can do that; but I want you to state the facts.

Mr. McKINNEY. Under this Administration not a single rebel flag has been returned or given up, but under the administration of Edwin M. Stanton twenty-one such flags were surrendered to the survivors of the organizations from which they were captured.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Surrendered to whom?

Mr. McKINNEY. To the survivors of the organizations from which they were captured. Those now in the hands of the Government are in a room in the upper story of the building of the War Department where they can be easily visited and examined.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. McKINNEY. I do not. Let the gentleman make his statement when I get through.

Mr. BOUTELLE again endeavored to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire declines to yield.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But the gentleman said——

Mr. McKINNEY. No matter what I said. You can reply to it in your own time, not in mine.

Mr. BOUTELLE again rose.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be interrupted. If the gentleman is a gentleman he will reply in his own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire declines to yield, and is entitled to proceed without interruption.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, whatever of the captured Confederate flags were returned to those who bore them in the war were returned by the officials of the Republican party. I am glad, however, that they were not all returned, for there are many good men on this floor who were of age and in good physical condition when the war broke out, but whose patriotism never led them in sight of a rebel flag while the war was being prosecuted. I presume it was because it was not safe to investigate them at that time; but now as they read the history of that mighty struggle their patriotism is aroused, the blood boils in their veins, and the thought of returning these flags that were captured by their brave brothers is more than they can endure.

But luckily for their peace of mind, these flags are safe from the hands of the enemy. They are stored in the attic of the War Department, where they may go at any time and under the guidance of a Democratic official they may feast their soul upon the tattered and moth-eaten emblems of the lost cause. Go, brethren, go, and look upon the trophies of brave and noble men, and remember while you look upon them that none of the glory that shall surround the history of those who bore them off the field in triumph will ever crown the history of your lives; and bear in mind, and enforce it upon your children and friends, that this Administration has returned no rebel flags.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What does the gentleman mean by "return?"

Mr. McKINNEY. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to know what the gentleman means by the word "return," in that connection.

Mr. McKINNEY. I repeat, I do not yield to you. I will yield to that gentleman nothing.

A MEMBER on the Democratic side. Sit down.

Mr. McKINNEY. But there is another charge——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Who said that?

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Chairman, I must insist that I may be permitted to proceed without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes gentlemen on the floor will assist the Chair in preserving order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I was inquiring who it was in response to my inquiry said "sit down."

Mr. McKINNEY. Yes, you are always "inquiring." But there is one other charge that has been brought against the President. He has appointed rebel brigadiers to office, which is an offense to every ex-Union soldier who sacrificed for his country when these brigadiers were attempting to destroy it. Now we had an idea that all citizens of this country stood upon an equality; that every citizen entitled to vote under the Constitution had an equal right to compete with his fellows for any office he might desire to hold; and also that the appointing power had a right to select from the various States in the Union such citizens as might be considered for place. Now as regards rebel brigadiers, I did not know we had any in this country. We did have them during the war; they were a part of that class of men who seceded from the Union, set up a government of their own, and declared their allegiance to it, and renounced the Union of which they had before been a part. But we of the North denied their right to go out of the Union. We declared they could not secede; and as an earnest of the faith that was in us we enlisted large armies, and at the point of the bayonet we enforced our idea. After four years of war, after the best blood of the nation, both North and South, had been shed, the Northern Army was victorious. The South laid down their arms, and General Grant commanded the armies of the South to go home and take their horses with them, to till their farms and raise bread for their wives and children. The Northern idea had been victorious; secession was a failure; the Union was as broad as ever, and reached from ocean to ocean, and from Canada to the Gulf.

The people of the South were refractory children of the Union and deserved such punishment as the nation saw fit to inflict. The Republican party was in power in every branch of the Government; they extended to these children of the South the hand of brotherhood; they invited them back again to the old home from which they had wandered, and like the prodigal of old, they should be received again with joy. They were invited to re-form their State governments according to the Constitution and send their Senators again to the halls of legislation, to elect from among their citizens representatives to the halls of Congress, and once more we should dwell together in peace and love.

Was not this what the Republican party said to the South? The South accepted the olive branch; they returned to their first love; they renounced the Confederacy; they proclaimed once more their allegiance to the Union; they sent their representatives to the halls of legislation, and were once more at peace with themselves and with the entire people. But when in the exercise of their right the voters of this country elected a majority of Democrats to this House this same Republican party that had invited them here set up the cry of rebel brigadier against them. And every Northern Democrat who voted with them was proclaimed an ally of the Confederacy. I have no apology to offer for those who rebelled against the Government that had nurtured them.

A MEMBER. Have not they all stated that?

Mr. McKINNEY. I have not a word to offer in palliation of their crime against the flag which had so long protected them; but I do say that it does not lie in the mouth of the Republican party, by whose own acts they are here, to raise the cry of rebel brigadier. They are here as a part of this nation, the mightiest on this earth. They have not refrained from joining the Representatives from the North in voting appropriations for the support of the Government. They have not lifted their voice against the appropriation of the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been voted to the Union soldiers as a reward for their loyalty and sacrifice—the best possible evidence that they have accepted the result of the war, and are ready to join hands with us in bearing the flag of freedom to nobler heights than it has ever attained in the past. But let us see if this cry of rebel brigadier is because those men were once members of the Confederate army, or whether it is because they are members of the Democratic party.

Was General Longstreet a Union soldier? No; he was a rebel major-general; one of the strongest supports of General Lee in his defense of Richmond. When the war ended he soon saw where his greatest interest lay, and he cast his lot with the Republican party. That party did not cry out to him rebel brigadier, but bade him welcome, and appointed him to the important office of collector of the port of New Orleans, and afterwards United States marshal of the district of Georgia.

Was General Mosby a Union man? No; he was also a rebel brigadier. He carried on his warfare after the style of the guerrilla. He seldom faced our forces on the open field, but hanging on the mountain side watching the little band of Union scouts in the valley, like as a lion pounces upon his prey, he pounced upon the little squad of men and shot them down or bore them away as prisoners of war.

No man in the Confederacy was so despised by the Union soldier as General Mosby. But when the war was over, seeing his opportunity, he proclaimed allegiance to the Republican party, with what result? He was welcomed to their fold, and sent across the ocean as minister to a foreign land.

Thousands of Union soldiers who bore evidence of honorable service for their country, equally well qualified for the position, were passed over, that this particularly obnoxious Confederate general might be honored. [Applause.] Was General Mahone a Union soldier? No; he was also a rebel. He, observing where his personal interests lay, proclaimed his allegiance to the Republican party, and the whole power of a Republican administration was turned to his assistance that he might deliver a State into the hands of that party. And if the inside of the contract by which the agreement was made could be opened to the world, it would bring a blush of shame to the cheek of every loyal American. But why continue this list? Every intelligent citizen knows that there were hundreds of them.

I did not think when preparing this that I might also have called attention to one Mr. Chalmers, of the shoe-string district fame in Mississippi, a man charged with ballot-box stuffing and every other crime known to the law, a man who was sent away from the House because he was elected by fraud, and yet when the Democratic party would no longer stand by him he proclaimed his allegience to the Republican party, the party took him up, and in the last Republican convention he made a speech as the Republican delegate, and is now one of the most lovely and sweet fellows in the world. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] No one who knows him believes him an iota better than when he was turned out of the Democratic party because he was a fraud and a scoundrel. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen here at my side are calling my attention to some thirty or forty more rebel brigadiers who are in the same position, and yet I will not stop to mention them specifically, but I have included them under the general head of "Promiscuous."

The great sin, then, in the eyes of the Republican party does not consist in the fact that a man has been a rebel brigadier. No matter how strong a fight he made against the Union, no matter though he disregarded every rule of civilized warfare, no matter though he was the last to lay down his arms and acknowledge the supremacy of the Constitution, all that was necessary was to proclaim allegiance to the Republican party, and though his sins were as scarlet he became as white as snow, and they gathered him to their bosom as one who was worthy of all honor, and the smile of love that wreathed their countenances was like the sweet smile of a young mother when she looks upon the face of her first born. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the sin of having been a rebel is nothing in the eyes of the Republican party as compared with the sin of being a Democrat. That is the one sin they can not forgive. No matter how true they have been to the Government, no matter how bravely they fought for the Union, to vote the Democratic ticket is the one unpardonable sin. And twenty-three years after the war is over, when a new generation has grown up who only knows of the war through history and the stories of the war told them by their gray-haired veteran fathers, the leader of the Republican party proclaims to the world that such men as Hancock and McClellan, who so nobly defended the Union in the hour of its peril and shed their blood for its perpetuation, were allies of the Confederacy.

Is it any wonder that the people in their indignation overthrew that party and proclaimed that henceforth they would follow the old Stars and Stripes rather than the Republican flag, the bloody shirt? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Thank God, our country is once more united. [Applause.] Our people are bound by the ties that can never be severed; and once more we have a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. Notwithstanding the dire consequences that the Republican party prophesied would follow the election of a Democratic President, under the administration of Grover Cleveland our national integrity has been maintained. We have paid three hundred millions of dollars of our national debt; the business of the country is prosperous; our people are happy.

More soldiers have been pensioned than ever before in the same period since the war. More money is being distributed to the needy. More soldiers are in office, and the bow of promise to our country is more radiant than it has ever been in the past; and when next November comes the voters of this country in the exercise of the noblest right that ever was conferred upon the people of any nation will render their verdict at the ballot-box in favor of him who knows no North, no South, no East, no West, but who has administered the Government for the benefit of the whole people—Grover Cleveland. [Prolonged applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. McKINNEY then resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

Mr. KERR. I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire before he takes his seat to answer my question as to whether there is not necessity for additional pension legislation?

Mr. McKINNEY. I would like very much, Mr. Chairman, to publish some other matter that I did not read during the course of my remarks.

There was no objection.

APPENDIX A.

THE PRIVATE PENSION VETOES—PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S REASONS FOR THE VETO OF THE PRIVATE PENSION BILLS—PRESERVING THE RIGHTS OF ALL PENSIONERS AND MAINTAINING THE HONOR OF THE PENSION-ROLL—NEARLY EVERY VETO SUSTAINED BY THE ACTION OF REPUBLICAN COMMISSIONERS OF PENSIONS.

ANDREW J. HILL.

Vetoed because proposed beneficiary's name is Alfred J. Hill. The bill would be inoperative.

ABIGAIL SMITH.

Vetoed for the reason that the bill would reduce the pension she is receiving under the general law.

LOUIS MELCHER.

After less than three months' service was discharged August 16, 1861, for "lameness caused by previous repeated ulcerations of the legs, extending deeply among the muscles and impairing their powers and action by cicatrices, all existing before enlistment." Claim consequently rejected by Pension Bureau. The cicatrices showed beyond doubt the previous existence of this difficulty, and the term of service was too short to have developed and healed repeated ulcerations in a location previously healthy. (Veto upholds surgeon's certificate made at time of discharge, and upon which the Pension Office based its action.) Commissioner Dudley rejected this claim in 1884.

ELIZABETH S. DE KRAFFT.

Vetoed to save her arrearages to which she is entitled under the general law. The only effect of this bill would be to reduce her pension.

ELIZABETH LUCE.

Husband applied for pension shortly after his discharge, January, 1864, alleging disability from being thrown forward on pommel of his saddle when in service. No record to that effect and no such evidence could be produced. Surgeon's certificate at discharge states disability arose from "organic stricture" existing at time of enlistment. Claim rejected. Twenty years after he died of chronic gastritis. Soldier's death did not result from disability or injury contracted in military service. Claim for pension rejected in 1868 by Commissioner Barrett; August, 1883, by Commissioner Dudley, and January, 1885, by Commissioner Clarke.

CARTER W. TILLER.

Claim filed in Pension Office 1877 as dependent father, which was rejected. Claimant enjoyed a fair salary as a policeman ever since his son's death. The latter deserted, and ten months thereafter died. This claim was rejected in July, 1879, by Commissioner Bentley.

ELEANOR C. BANGHAM.

In July, 1885, upon special examination, pensioner admitted her husband suffered from epilepsy from early childhood, and that he committed suicide during a despondent mood following an epileptic fit. Pension withdrawn, it being apparent that his epilepsy was not contracted in service.

DAVID W. HAMILTON.

In his application for pension November, 1879, fourteen years after his final discharge from the Army and just prior to the expiration of time for filing claims for pension arrearages, and after the death of his family physician, he admitted that he suffered from hydrocele as early as 1856. His claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that his alleged disability existed prior to his enlistment. This claim was rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1883.

JAMES C. CHANDLER.

Applied twice for pension. In his first application, 1869, he alleged that in April, 1862, he was run over by a wagon and injured in his ankle. The records show that he was discharged less than two months afterwards for chronic bronchitis. In his second application he alleged he contracted typhoid fever in May, 1862, resulting in "rheumatism and disease of the back in region of kidneys." Yet in January, 1864, he again enlisted, was pronounced sound, and served until mustered out, September, 1865.

JOHN D. HAM.

Claimed that while riding from his home to join a regiment his horse fell on his ankle and injured him; never joined any regiment, but returned home; the next year was drafted, accepted as physically sound, and served out his term. Seventeen years afterwards applied for a pension for injury to his ankle, which was denied after investigation by the Pension Bureau, by Commissioner Dudley, December, 1883.

EDWARD AYERS.

The application to the Pension Bureau rejected on the ground that investigation proved that the injury complained of was sustained when a boy; that there is no record to show that he was injured in the Army. He deserted in May, 1863, and was subsequently arrested and returned to his regiment. This claim was rejected by Commissioner Baker in 1873, and twice by Commissioner Dudley—1882 and 1884.

DUDLEY B. BRANCH.

Alleged hernia from a fall while getting over a fence June 9, 1862, but served more than a year afterward, and in 1863 was transferred to the invalid corps for an entirely different disability. Did not apply for pension until thirteen and a half years after his fall (December, 1875), and his claim was rejected by Pension Bureau for want of satisfactory evidence. No reason why exception should be made and bureau overruled. Claim rejected June, 1883, by Commissioner Dudley.

REBECCA ELDRIDGE.

Husband was pensioned at $2 per month for slight wound which did not incapacitate him for manual labor. Over fifteen years after his discharge, while working about a building, he fell backward from a ladder, fractured his skull, and died same day. For this the bill proposed to pension widow. Vetoed because not pensionable. This claim was rejected by Commissioner Dudley in August, 1882.

MRS. ANNIE C. OWEN.

Husband mustered as second lieutenant December 14, 1861; discharged October 16, 1862; lived nearly fourteen years afterward and never applied for pension. Twenty-one years after his discharge his widow applied; alleged that he received two shell wounds on July 1, 1862, and died in 1876, from neuralgia of the heart some way caused by such wounds. There is no record of the wounds. Widow's claim was rejected by Pension Office; death not result of Army service. Claim was filed in 1883 and rejected by Commissioner Black in 1886.

J. D. HAWORTH.

This bill proposes to pension claimant for disability which had its origin in causes existing prior to enlistment, and not the result of Army service. This claim was rejected by Commissioner Bentley in 1880.

M. ROMAHN.

In 1882 claimed pension alleging that in winter of 1862 he incurred varicose veins from standing guard excessively. No record of his disability appears, and evidence of same being insufficient his claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau. He then made application to Congress and added another allegation, that in May, 1885, he was injured in breast and shoulder by a railroad accident while on detail duty. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1884.

SIMMONS W. HARDEN.

In application filed 1866 alleged he was injured by fall from a wagon while in service. Fourteen years later he claimed that he was afflicted with enlargement of lungs and heart from over-exertion at a review. His Army record makes no mention of either of these troubles, but shows that he had at some time dyspepsia and intermittent fever. (Veto upholds rejection by Pension Office.) This claim was rejected in 1868 by Commissioner Barrett, and again in 1884 by Commissioner Dudley.

THOMAS S. HOPKINS.

Enlisted June, 1862, discharged June, 1865. Filed claim November, 1880, and in June, 1881, was granted $50 per month for debility resulting from malarial fever and chronic diarrhea. This bill proposes to waive the limitation law of 1879 so that the beneficiary may claim $9,000 arrearages. It was subsequently altered to meet President's suggestions, and approved.

JOHN HUNTER.

Discharged July 13, 1865, expiration of term. Served twelve months. Fourteen years after discharge he filed claim for pension because of gunshot wound in leg while in skirmish. Though aided by the Bureau, it could not be shown that the injury was due to the service, and there being no record of his alleged wound his claim was rejected. Evidence recited in House Committee report fails to show continuous disability from wound, even if received. This claim was rejected in December, 1884, by Commissioner Clarke.

JOEL D. MONROE.

Enlisted August, 1864, and mustered out with regiment June, 1865. Fifteen years after filed claim alleging tree fell on him, injuring his eyes; and also that he contracted rheumatism in service. Rejected by Pension Office. No record of either disability, nor proof furnished that either originated in service. Claim rejected by Commissioner Black.

FRED J. LEESE.

Discharged June 4, 1865, after serving nine months. No record of disability. Eighteen years after discharge he filed claim which is still under investigation in Pension Office.

CORNELIA R. SCHENCK.

Husband enlisted August, 1861, mustered out October, 1864. No record of any disability in service; lived eleven years after discharge; never claimed disability, and died of inflammation of the stomach, etc., December, 1875. Ten years later his widow applies for pension and her claim is now under examination in Pension Bureau.

WILLAM H. BECK.

Enlisted in 1861; re-enlisted as a veteran volunteer in 1864; mustered out April, 1866. Thirteen years after discharge (1879) filed claim in Pension Office, alleging epilepsy incurred in 1863, caused by jar from heavy firing. Six months after the date of alleged injury he re-enlisted upon a medical certificate of perfect soundness, and served more than two years thereafter. No evidence to support bill. This claim was rejected, 1881, by Commissioner Bentley.

MARY J. NOTTAGE.

Husband enlisted 1861; discharged 1862 for "disease of urinary organs," which had troubled him for years. He died of consumption seventeen years after, without having made any claim for pension. In 1880 widow claimed pension, which was rejected. Disease was not contracted in the service.

JAMES E. O'SHEA.

Enlisted 1861; discharged 1864. Claimed pension for saber wound in head received March, 1862, and gunshot wound in leg in autumn of same year. Records are silent as to wounds, but show that in 1864 he was found guilty of desertion and sentenced to forfeit all pay, etc., for time absent.

JOHN S. WILLIAMS.

Alleged his shoulder was dislocated in 1862 while ferrying troops across a river; served afterwards until 1865. No record of such injury. Claim rejected in 1882 by Commissioner Dudley.

HENRY HIPPLE, JR.

Sixteen years after discharge discovered that during his service in Army, August, 1862 to May, 1863, he contracted rheumatism but received no treatment for it while in the Army, nor attendance by physician since discharge. Claim filed 1879. No facts shown to entitle him to pension. Rejected in 1882 by Commissioner Dudley.

JOHN W. FARRIS.

After having been allowed pension in 1885 for chronic diarrhea, claimed increase for sore eyes contracted 1884, in consequence of his previous ailment, etc. The bill contemplated pensioning him for disease of the eyes, which the medical referee of Pension Bureau reports "can not be admitted to be a result of chronic diarrhea."

ELIJAH P. HENSLEY.

In 1868 was granted pension dating from 1865, and drew until 1877, when upon evidence that the injury for which he was pensioned was not received in line of duty, his name was dropped from rolls. Appealed to Secretary of Interior, who sustained action of Pension Bureau.

ROBERT HALSEY.

Seventeen years after close of the war he filed claim in Pension Office, alleging that in 1863 he contracted fever affecting lungs, kidneys, and stomach. A board of surgeons in 1882 found disease of kidneys, but no indication of lung or stomach trouble. Three years later medical referee reported no disease of lungs or trouble since filing claim, and that the kidney difficulty had no relation to Army service. Veto sustains rejection by Pension Commissioner Black.

ALFRED DENNY.

Entered service June, 1863, as captain and assistant quartermaster. After remaining in that position less than a year he resigned to accept a civil position. Twenty years afterwards he filed claim in Pension Office, alleging that in August, 1863, he was thrown forward on the horn of his saddle, rupturing right side and subsequently of left side. The records disclose no evidence of any accident or disability. Claim rejected in 1884 by Commissioner Dudley.

MARRILLA PARSONS.

No claim filed in Pension Office. Her step-son enlisted in 1861, and subsequently died of consumption. No facts even are shown that the disease resulted from military service. Step-parents are not under the law entitled to pensions.

JACKSON STEWARD.

This case is pending in Pension Bureau, and no reason why it should not take its course.

ANNA A. PROBERT.

Husband, who was a druggist, died in Memphis of yellow fever, in 1878.

SAMUEL MILLER.

In 1880 filed claim in Pension Office, which was rejected. Board of surgeons failed to discover any evidence of disease. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1883.

CLARK BOON.

Filed claim in 1874, alleging lost his health while prisoner at Tyler, Tex. In October, 1874, filed affidavit that he contracted disease of heart and head in the service. In January, 1878, he abandoned allegations as to disease, and asked for pension on account of gunshot wound in ankle. Pension was granted in 1880 on theory of medical board that it was "possibie that applicant was entitled to a small rating for weakness of ankle." Not entitled to an increase. This claim was rejected in 1878 by Commissioner Bentley.

HEZEKIAH TILLMAN.

Claim for increase still pending in Pension Bureau.

CHARLES SCHULER.

Claim is pending in Pension Bureau and undetermined.

MARIA HUNTER.

Claimant's petition in Pension Bureau is pending undetermined.

JOSEPH TUTTLE.

Claims as dependent father. When soldier was nine years of age claimant abandoned the boy, who lived among strangers until 1861, when he enlisted and was killed in action in May, 1862. Claimant exhibited such indifference that he was not aware of his son's decease for two years thereafter. He is not entitled to profit by the death of this patriotic boy. Rejected by Commissioner Black in 1886.

ANDREW J. WILSON.

Drafted February, 1865; discharged following September on account of "chronic nephritis and deafness." In 1882 filed claim in Pension Office alleging that in June, 1865, he contracted rheumatism. As claims were rejected he repeatedly set up other complaints, none of which were sustained by the evidence. Now under examination by Pension Bureau.

MARY S. WOODSON.

Husband was discharged October, 1863, on account of disease of heart. He left home in 1874 and has not since been heard of. Rejected in 1884 by Commissioner Dudley. There is no other evidence.

SARAH HARBAUGH.

Soldier discharged September, 1864. Received wound in ankle May, 1863. Died of heart disease October, 1881. No connection between cause of death and Army service. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1883.

BRUNO SCHULTZ.

Applied for pension several years ago and rejected. Since then the case has been opened and is now awaiting additional evidence. Rejected in 1877 by Commissioner Bentley.

WILLIAM BISHOP.

Was enrolled as a substitute March 25, 1865, when high bounties were paid. Was admitted to hospital April 3, with measles. Returned to duty May 8, and mustered out with a detachment of unassigned men, May, 1865. Fifteen years afterwards (1880) filed claim alleging measles had affected his eyes and spinal column. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1881.

JULIA CONNELLY.

Husband was mustered into service October 26, 1861. He deserted November 14, 1861. Visited his family December 1, and was found drowned near his home December 30, 1861.

LOUISA C. BEEZELEY.

Husband was enrolled as a farrier in September, 1861. Discharged July, 1862, on account of "old age." Thirteen years afterwards he died. He never claimed pension. In 1877 his widow filed claim that he died from disease contracted in service, which was found to be erroneous. Rejected in 1882 by Commissioner Dudley.

CHARLES A. CHASE.

Enlisted September, 1864. Mustered out June, 1865. Fifteen years thereafter filed claim alleging disease of kidneys and liver from exposure, October, 1864. There is no record of alleged disease and no proof of its contraction in Army. Rejected in 1884 by Commissioner Dudley.

GILES C. HAWLEY.

Enlisted in August and discharged in November, 1861, "on account of deafness." Seventeen years thereafter (1878) he filed a claim in Pension Office alleging that from exposure and excessive duty his hearing was seriously affected, which was rejected. Since pensioned under the general law.

MARY ANDERSON.

Husband was pensioned on account of chronic diarrhea. In 1882 he was found dead on the railroad track. Pension Office rejected claim because death was not connected with military service.

HARRIET WELCH.

Husband fell from the cars in 1877 and was killed. The widow's claim was, by the Pension Office, rejected on the ground that death did not result from military service. Rejected in 1884 by Commissioner Dudley.

JAMES BUTLER.

On the 11th of September, 1864, while at his home after enlistment, but before his company was organized, he fell into a cellar, fractured his leg, and was discharged. In December, 1864, his claim for pension was rejected by the Pension Office, and again in 1871. The claimant was never mustered into the service of the United States, and his injury was not received in the performance of duty.

JAMES H. DARLING.

Discharged in 1862. Filed claim in Pension Office alleging rheumatism. Rejected on account of not being result of army service. Medical examination in 1877 and again in 1882 showed that he was not entitled to pension.

SALLIE WEST.

Disease which produced husband's death had not its origin in his military service.

MARTHA M'ILWAIN.

Husband lost a leg in 1862 and was pensioned for disability. In 1883, while under the influence of liquor, he took morphine, from which he died. The death was not due to military service.

ALICE E. TRAVERS.

Husband was discharged June, 1866. He was a druggist, and was in the habit of taking opiates. He died, 1881, from an overdose of morphine. He never applied for a pension. The claim was properly rejected by Pension Office in 1886.

WILLIAM H. STARR.

Case is pending in Pension Bureau, awaiting additional evidence. It should be concluded there before special legislation is resorted to.

PHILIP ARNER.

Discharged from service in July, 1864. In fall of 1865 he was taken ill, since which time he has been troubled with lung difficulty. Pension Office rejected claim 1883. Absolutely no allegation of any incident of his service related to his sickness.

MARY NORMAN.

Soldier was mustered out June, 1866. Was drowned while trying to cross Roanoke River in 1868. In 1881 the claim was rejected because death was not due to military service. Rejected in 1881 by Commissioner Bentley.

MARY A. VAN ETTEN.

Soldier was drowned near his residence in New York in 1875. The widow presented her claim ten years after husband's death. Rejected in 1885 by Commissioner Black.

JAMES D. COTTON

This claim is pending in the Pension Office and undetermined as to the dependence of claimant at date of soldier's death.

DAVID T. ELDERKIN.

Enlisted August, 1862; he was dishonorably discharged June 11, 1863, with forfeiture of all bounty, pay, and allowances. In 1882 he filed claim in Pension Office, which was rejected. Rejected by Commissioner Black.

GEORGE W. GUYSE.

Filed claim in Pension Office 1878, alleging gunshot wound received in skirmish, 1863. Examining surgeon, 1884, reports that he finds no indication of gunshot wound. Three of his comrades who originally testified in his behalf afterwards denied that the wound was received in service. The evidence tends to show that he cut his knee after his discharge. The Pension Office properly rejected claim.

MARY ANN MILLER.

Her husband enlisted in 1861 and went into camp near Cincinnati. June 3, 1861, he went into the city on a private affair and was killed in altercation with some unknown person. His death was not connected with military service. Claim rejected in 1879 by Commissioner Van Aernam.

NEWCOMB PARKER.

Vetoed for claimant's benefit, to save him the pension allowed him prior to passage of bill, of which this act would have deprived him if signed.

JOHN S. KIRKPATRICK.

Sixteen years after discharge alleges varicose veins contracted in 1862, yet served until discharged, 1864. No record of any disability.

WILLIAM BOONE.

While celebrating the Fourth of July at his home was injured by discharge of a cannon. Injury not in line of duty.

WILLIAM DERMODY.

Mustered out July 17, 1865. On July 23 was wounded in personal fight, not in line of duty. Rejected in 1881 by Commissioner Bentley.

ABNER MOREHEAD.

Applies, 1879, to be restored to pension-roll, having been dropped therefrom in 1876 because disability for which he was pensioned was shown to have existed prior to enlistment, and testimony taken afterwards by special examiner conclusively established such fact.

JOSEPH ROMISER.

Was not in a State or United States organization at time of injury for which pension was claimed, and not pensionable.

ARETUS F. LOOMIS.

Vetoed to save pensioner four years pension of which the act as passed would have deprived him.

ROXANA V. ROWLEY.

Husband, after little over three months' service, tendered his resignation as first lieutenant on account of incompetency. In 1880, fifteen years after discharge, he applied for pension, alleging disease of liver while in service. The physician attending him before enlistment stated that claimant was so afflicted as early as 1854, and regarded as incurable. Soldier died 1881; his widow applied 1882; her claim rejected by Commissioner Dudley because the disease existed prior to enlistment.

MRS. MARGARET A. JOCOBY.

Husband disappeared in 1875, and never heard of by her since. In 1885 she applied for pension on ground that he partially lost his mind from deafness and chronic diarrhea in service. His death from such cause has not a particle of proof to rest upon.

ELIZABETH M'KAY.

Never applied to Pension Bureau; but bill is based on her allegation that husband contracted chronic diarrhea in 1862, and died from effects thereof in 1874. He was discharged June, 1864, with loss of all pay and emoluments; had applied in 1870, alleging various disabilities, none of them of the nature of diarrhea. There is no medical testimony to support widow's claim.

JAMES T. IRWIN.

Applied 1876, rejected 1879, his various allegations not well founded. Again applied September, 1884, alleging disease of heart contracted twenty years prior. Allegations not supported by examining surgeons in three different examinations. Rejected in 1879 by Commissioner Bentley.

WILLIAM H. NEVIL.

Pensioner been drawing since 1865 the same amount provided by this bill. Its passage would be valueless to him.

H. L. KYLER.

Drew pension since 1864 for neuralgia and eye disease. Pension stopped 1880 on proof he had been under treatment for those very ailments five years before entering Army. Enlisted for one hundred days only. Dropped from rolls in 1882 by Commissioner Dudley.

FANNIE E. EVANS.

Claimed her husband contracted hernia, 1863. He never claimed pension, and died, 1883, of apoplexy. Rejected, 1884, by Commissioner Dudley.

JAMES CARROLL.

Alleged wound while securing recruits for Company B, Third North Carolina Mounted Volunteers. Name not borne on any of those company rolls, and for that reason his claim was rejected by Pension Bureau. A claim to same effect by one Perkins, claiming same service and injury, was allowed in 1873, but pension stopped, 1877, on same ground as Carroll's. Investigation showed that while plundering their neighborhood with a number of men they had collected they were hunted down by home guards and shot at the time they stated. Claim rejected in 1883 by Commissioner Dudley.

EDWARD M. HARRINGTON.

Filed claim in Pension Bureau, 1879. Injuries not related to Army service.

LEWIS W. SCANLAND.

Applied for pension 1884, alleging he contracted chronic diarrhea in Black Hawk war of 1832. On examination by board of surgeons, 1884, he did not claim to have diarrhea for a good many years, but claimed to be affected with constipation, except at times when taking medicine for it. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in December, 1884.

ROBERT H. STAPLETON.

Applied in 1883, alleging injury while acting as lieutenant-colonel in 1862. Examination in 1882 showed three left ribs fractured, which, if result of injury received in 1862, must have been then apparent. By law claims of this description must, to be valid, be successfully prosecuted prior to July 4, 1874. Claimant's delay to apply is not explained. His rank does not indicate his ignorance of the law. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1883.

SALLY ANN BRADLEY.

Husband, after long service, was discharged 1865; afterwards pensioned for gunshot wound, and died 1882 from a cause not claimed as from military service.

MARIA CUNNINGHAM.

Husband applied for pension in 1876, alleging shell wound in head. Claim rejected, as no disability appeared from that cause. Died in 1877 from other causes. Claim rejected by Pension Bureau because cause of soldier's death was not shown to have had its origin in military service. Rejected in 1885 by Commissioner Black.

MRS. CATHARINE M'CARTY.

Filed claim 1886 alleging her husband died in service from overdose of colchicum. Evidence indisputably shows that the day previous to soldier's death a comrade asked him to smell and taste some medicine, which he did, became very sick, and died next morning. Death not result of Army service. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1882.

MARGARET D. MARCHAND.

Husband entered the Navy in 1828, was retired 1870, and died of heart disease 1875. Claim filed in Pension Office 1883 and rejected because no evidence furnished to prove death resulted from naval service. Rejected in 1883 by Commissioner Dudley.

JOHN TAYLOR.

Has received pension since 1865—has been twice increased, once by Pension Office, and again by special act, 1882. The increase here applied for was denied by Pension Office because he was already receiving pension "commensurate with his disability."

AUGUSTUS FIELD STEVENS.

Discharged October 3, 1861, after serving less than two months. Rejected by Pension Bureau in 1882, after full examination. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1882.

MARY KARSTETTER.

Husband drew pension since June, 1865, for gunshot wound in left hand, and died August, 1874, of gastritis and congestion of kidneys. Widow applied 1882, alleging soldier died of wounds received in battle, and that he was injured while in Army by a horse running over him, which is not supported by evidence and has no necessary connection with cause of husband's death. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1884.

DANIEL H. ROSS.

Filed claim in Pension Bureau and died February, 1886. Bill vetoed so as to save the widow's rights.

JENNETTE DOW.

Husband employed in railroading fifteen years after muster-out; died 1882, of apoplexy. Widow applied 1883, claiming he died of wound received in Army. Pension Office rejected claim.

MARY J. HAGEMAN.

Husband, pensioner for wound, died August, 1884, twenty years after discharge, from typho-malarial fever. His widow's application was rejected by Pension Bureau because the disease was not due to military service. Rejected by Commissioner Black in 1885.

WILLIAM H. WEAVER.

Applied twelve years after discharge. After six special examinations by Pension Bureau to ascertain the truth and deal fairly by this claimant, his claim was rejected because disease for which he claimed pension was shown to have existed prior to his enlistment.

RACHEL BARNES.

Husband committed suicide by hanging. It was proposed in this bill to pension beneficiary as widow by reason of soldier's death. His death, however, is not connected with his military service. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1883.

DUNCAN FORBES.

Increase of pension. Has been liberally pensioned from January, 1865, and served three years in Navy since that time without further disability.

GEORGE W. CUTLER.

After several allegations made at different times, each giving different causes, none substantiated as arisen from the service, his pension claim remains as originally rejected in 1865. Veto upholds rejection. Rejected by Commissioner Barrett in 1865.

ANN KINNEY.

Husband was pensioned, 1865, for wound; died 1875. Widow claimed pension, alleging his death was from effects of the wound. He was addicted to periodical sprees, and in one of these, while creating a disturbance, was taken by city marshal and placed in lock-up, where he died suddenly an hour afterward. Rejected by Commissioner Bentley in 1878.

SUSAN HAWES.

In 1883 her son attempted to board a moving freight train, made a misstep, and car-wheel passed over his foot. Two physicians called in deemed amputation necessary and administered preparatory anæsthetic, but patient died before amputation, two hours after accident. His death is not attributable to his military service. Rejected by Commissioner Black in 1885.

ABRAHAM POINTS.

Discharged June 28, 1865; in 1878 applied for pension on ground of stiffened elbow joints and sore eyes contracted in service. No such record of these disabilities, but his neighbors and acquaintances of good repute showed conclusively that these disabilities existed prior to his enlistment. Rejected in February, 1885, by Commissioner Clarke.

MRS. AMELIA C. RICHARDSON.

Remarried 1858. In 1862 her son by former husband enlisted and died in service 1865. He had not lived with his mother after her remarriage, and there is no competent evidence that he contributed to her support after that event. At the time of his death his step-father was earning $70 per month and owning considerable property, part of which still remains to him. Not dependent.

WILLIAM DICKENS.

Vetoed to benefit claimant, as the bill, if passed, would have deprived him of back pension already granted him from 1864 to date.

BENJAMIN OBEKIAH.

Beneficiary has already been six months on pension-roll for same amount fixed by this bill.

MRS. MARGARET DUNLAP.

Beneficiary is mother of a soldier who was, in 1864, killed by one of his comrades in a personal row. Rejected in 1872 by Commissioner Baker. The injury was not received in line of duty.

WILLIAM LYNCH.

Discharged 1859. Twenty-four years afterward, April, 1884, claimed pension for rheumatism contracted in 1857–'58 in Utah. Claim still pending in Pension Bureau.

ALEXANDER FALCONER.

Case is provided for by a general law recently approved.

JAMES BAYLOR.

In this case no advantage would accrue to beneficiary under special act, and justice will be done him under general law. Rejected in 1879 by Commissioner Bentley.

MRS. CATHARINE SATTLER.

Soldier was wounded in battle August, 1864, and discharged by amputation of left fore-arm March, 1865. Subsequently the same year he was married to beneficiary and pensioned; pension increased 1866. October 31, 1867, drew his monthly pay of $50 as United States watchman at New York City; disappeared that day, and on November 13, 1867, his body was found in North River, New York City. Was strong and healthy at time of death. Nearly seventeen years afterward, in 1884, his widow on above facts applied for pension, which was denied November, 1884, as soldier's death was not due to his military service. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley.

FRANKLIN SWEET.

Already on pension-rolls for the same amount named in the bill.

ROBERT K. BENNETT.

Soon after enlistment, September, 1862, was detailed to cook-shop, and five months thereafter was received into hospital from which he was discharged from the service three weeks later for "varicocele to which he was subject four years before enlistment." Seventeen years afterward claimed pension for hernia and piles contracted in service. Claim rejected 1883. Medical examination, made 1882, states no evidence or symptons of disability resulting from Army service. Rejected in 1883 by Commissioner Dudley.

JESSE CAMPBELL.

His claim, rejected 1881, was reopened January, 1887, and he has been pensioned under the general law.

LOREN BURRITT.

Pensioned since 1886, and now draws $72 monthly pension, the highest under general laws. There are over one thousand other pensioners of this class on the rolls worthy of the same special legislation, and all should be treated alike. Unfair to make two rates for same disability.

ABRAHAM P. GRIGGS.

Enlisted August, 1861, entered hospital January, 1863. Discharged the service therefrom November, 1863. His discharge certificate states "worthlessness, obesity, and imbecility, and laziness," "totally unfit for the Invalid Corps, or for any other military duty." Nearly twenty years after his discharge claimed pension for rheumatism. A board of United States examining surgeons report no pensionable disability existing, and that he is able to work. Claim rejected in 1885 by Commissioner Black.

CUDBERT STONE.

Over sixteen years after discharge claimed pension for piles contracted in service. Claim rejected in October, 1884, by Commissioner Dudley, on ground that disability originated while undergoing court-martial sentence, therefore not in line of duty. The committee recommend pension be granted beneficiary "by reason of faithful service to his country," whereas in his thirty-nine months' service with no record of disability, thirty-five months were passed in desertion or imprisonment therefor.

CHARLOTTE O'NEAL.

Husband resigned from service June, 1862. Seven months thereafter he died of disease which, it is admitted, had no relation to Army service.

JOHN REED, SR.

Filed application in Pension Office, 1887, alleging he was dependent upon deceased soldier for support; that his wife died in 1872, and filed an affidavit of a man who alleged he was present at her death. This was in 1883 rejected. This claimant, in 1859, abandoned his wife and family, and never thereafter contributed to their support. The soldier's mother was granted a pension in 1862, and enjoyed it until 1884, when she died. His claim was false, and was supported by false testimony.

JOHN D. FINCHER.

Twenty years after discharge from service (1882) he filed claim for pension, which was rejected, because in 1882 and again in 1885 he was examined by a board of surgeons, who report no disability.

JACOB SMITH.

Vetoed because this bill proposes to reduce the pension of a worthy soldier.

RACHEL ANN PIERPONT.

Vetoed because its approval would reduce the amount she is now receiving.

MARGARET R. JONES.

Is now receiving the highest pension allowed by law in such cases. No reason for an exception in her case.

ANTHONY M'ROBERTSON.

Applied for pension 1874. In November, 1886, the highest rate allowed by general law was granted him, to date from 1863.

WILLIAM H. MORHISER.

The bill proposes to allow him pay and allowances for a period for which the records show he has already been paid.

ANN WRIGHT.

Vetoed because she receives under general laws the same amount here proposed. Rejected in 1882 by Commissioner Dudley.

SARAH HAMILTON.

Husband of claimant deserted May, 1863. June, 1864, arrested as a deserter; returned to duty September, 1864. In 1872 he applied for pension, alleging injury to left leg, causing varicose veins, sustained in February, 1863, which was granted. He died in 1883 of apoplexy, which had no relation to his injury. Rejected in 1883 by Commissioner Dudley.

HANNAH R. LANGDON.

Husband served six months as an assistant surgeon, when he resigned. In 1880 filed application for pension, alleging chronic diarrhea and piles. Granted pension January, 1881, and died following September of consumption. Widow's claim was rejected by Pension Bureau because death was unconnected with disease for which pension had issued or with his military service. Rejected in 1883 by Commissioner Dudley.

BETSY MANSFIELD.

Filed claim in 1882, alleging dependent parent. Evidence disclosed not dependent.

LAURA A. WRIGHT.

Nearly twenty years after the war her husband committed suicide. No result from wound.

H. BROKENSHAW.

Received at draft rendezvous 25th March, 1865, mustered out 30th June, 1865. Eighteen years after (1883) he filed application alleging that March 25, 1865, he hurt his ribs in a scuffle with recruits, which was rejected—not incurred in line of duty. Rejected in 1886 by Commissioner Black.

HANNA C. DEWITT.

Vetoed because a precise duplicate of this act was passed by present Congress, and signed by the President.

MORRIS T. MANTOR.

Filed claim in Pension Office in 1882, and denied because no pensionable disability existed.

WILLIAM P. WITT.

Enlisted in one hundred days' service. No record of disability. Twenty years later filed claim, alleging chronic diarrhea, rheumatism, liver disease, and impaired hearing. No evidence to sustain either complaint excepting deafness, which did not result from Army service. Rejected in 1886 by Commissioner Black.

CHLOE QUIGGLE.

Husband enlisted in February, 1865, mustered out in September, 1865. In 1882 he died of disease not incident to Army service. Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1884.

WILLIAM H. BRIMMER.

Was a wagon-master; dsscharged May, 1865; no record of any disability; twenty-three years after filed claim for pension, alleging rupture in 1864. Unsupported by sufficient evidence.

WILLIAM SACKMAN, SR.

His discharge states his disability "caused by falling off his horse near Fredericktown, Mo., while intoxicated." "A discharge would benefit the Government as well as himself." The surgeon who made the certificate in reply to Pension Office says, "I remember the case distinctly; I made the examination in person, and read the statement to the man, and he consented to have the papers forwarded as they read. The application for pension is fraudulent." Rejected by Commissioner Dudley in 1883.

MARY SULLIVAN.

Vetoed because a precise duplicate of this was signed by the President July 1, 1886. Rejected in 1884 by Commissioner Dudley.

EMILY G. MILLS.

Husband, a retired naval officer, was accidentally shot and killed, 1873, by a neighbor who was attempting to shoot an owl. Not a pensionable case.

GEORGIA A. STRIKLETT.

Widow's claim is based upon allegation that he was wounded with buckshot by bushwhackers while recruiting in 1863. No record of such wounds. Soldier made no claim for pension. The evidence shows that he was killed by a pistol shot in an altercation with another man. Rejected in 1885 by Commissioner Black.

THEORORA M. PIATT.

Her husband served in the volunteer army as major and afterwards entered the regular Army and was subsequently placed on the retired list, where he remained until April, 1885, when he died by suicide. He was practicing law in Kentucky. Not pensionable.

NANCY F. JENNINGS.

Her husband was discharged June 24, 1862. Never applied for pension. Died 1877 of apoplexy. Not result of Army service. Rejected in 1886 by Commissioner Black.

SALLY A. RANDALL.

Her first husband enlisted in the war of 1812 and was discharged in 1814. Died April 12, 1831. Never applied for pension. Death not result from military service.

CYRENIUS G. STRYKER.

Filed claim 1879, alleging injury to spine September, 1862. Repeated medical examination failed to reveal any disability, and was rejected accordingly. Rejected by Commissioner Black in 1886.

WILLIAM H. HESTER.

Claims injury to eyes by sand blowing into them in a storm in 1869. It is conceded in the report of the committee to which this bill was referred that the claim was largely supported by perjury and forgery, but that claimant was believed to be innocent. The evidence in the Pension Office clearly establishes the whole case to be fraudulent and sustained wholly by perjury.

ROYAL J. HIAR.

Alleged disease not result of Army service. Rejected March, 1885, by Commissioner Clarke.

ELLEN SHEA.

Soldier never claimed pension. No record of any disability. In 1884 lost his life in a snow-slide in Colorado. Not a result of Army service. Rejected January, 1885, by Commissioner Clarke.

FARNAREN BALL.

Soldier died in 1872 from overdose of laudunum. Not entitled to pension. Rejected by Commissioner Black in 1885.

ELIZABETH BURR.

Husband enlisted for and served one hundred days in 1864. Never applied for pension. Died April, 1867, of dropsy. Thirteen years afterward his widow claimed pension on ground that the dropsy was contracted in service. Claim rejected by Pension Office as not sustained by evidence.

CHARLES GLAMANN.

Served to July, 1865. No record of injury or sickness except an attack of remittent fever. Fifteen years later claimed pension, alleging he was accidently struck and injured in left arm with a half brick by a comrade, doubtless result of personal altercation.

MARY F. HARKINS.

Husband pensioned for wound in right foot; died seventeen years after his discharge "from rupture of the heart." Widow's claim for pension, on ground that death was the result of the wound in foot, was properly rejected by the Pension Bureau on ground that the death cause was not the result of the wound. Rejected in 1884 by Commissioner Dudley.

ELLEN SEXTON.

Her husband, discharged 1864 for disability arising from vicious indulgence, died in 1875 of consumption. The cause of his death is not due to the Government service.

DOLLY BLAZER.

Husband mustered out June, 1865; never applied for pension, and died thirteen years afterward of yellow fever. Disapproved for reason that his death was not due to his military service. Rejected in 1886 by Commissioner Black.

ELIJAH MARTIN.

Vetoed because the proposed beneficiary is dead.

VIRTUE SMITH.

Husband was pensioned in 1867 for wound. Pension twice increased. Held Government clerkship sixteen years, and died in 1880, aged 64, of consumption. Up to 1877 was in excellent physical condition. His death was not related to his military service.

LIEUT. JAMES G. W. HARDY.

While traveling in recruiting service, 1864, placed his arm outside railroad-car window, when it was struck by something outside, and one of the bones broken. Had no right of action against railroad company. His fracture was not properly adjusted for ten months, during which time he remained in service. Pension Office rejected his claim. His injury was evidently the result of his carelessness.

MARY MINOR HOXEY.

Husband was pensioned, 1871, for wounds, and in 1879 was allowed arrearages from time of his discharge. He died December, 1881, of consumption while drawing pension of $17 per month. In 1884 his widow was allowed pension at same rate (also pension for two minor children, now attained the age of sixteen years), and still receives it, the same as allowed to all widows of her class. The bill proposed an increase of her pension, which would be unjust to other claimants equally meritorious.

JOHN A. TURLEY.

Interfered in altercation on steam-boat, under charge of an officer, and fallig, struck his head fatally. The bill proposed to pension his widow therefor. His death, however, was not the result of his military service.

MARY ANN DOUGHERTY.

Her widow's pension, secured in 1878, through fraudulent testimony and much false swearing on her part, and stopped upon discovering her husband was alive and himself drawing a pension. The bill in this case now proposes to grant her pension for injury she alleged to have receive while making cartridges in United States arsenal. Records show no such woman was ever employed there.

POLLY H. SMITH.

Husband, in 1870, after sixteen years' service, was placed on retired-list as officer on account of incapacity arising from fistula, developed in 1868. Fifteen years after his retirement, while attempting to raise a trunk to his shoulder, he suddenly died of heart disease. It is not seen how cause of his death can be connected with his service or incapacity therefrom.

JOEL B. MORTON.

Claimed pension for death of his son, Calvin Morton, in Custer massacre, 1876. The casualty records of the massacre, though very complete, contain no mention of such a soldier. Pension Bureau now searching for proof of son's service, which, if obtained, will secure claimant justice under general law. War Department records show Morton was alive and drawing pay two years after his death as claimed by this bill.

JULIA WELCH.

Her widow's pension claim having been rejected by Pension Bureau because soldier died from disease which bore no relation to any complaint contracted by him in Army, the veto upholds such rejection as correct. Rejected in 1886 by Commissioner Black.

MARY ANN LANG.

Husband was pensioned for wound in nose and died February, 1881, of dropsy. Widow's claim, filed 1884, was rejected on ground that soldier's fatal disease was not the result of his military service. Reputable medical evidence shows that soldier died of liver trouble from long and excessive drinking of beer and liquor; drinking harder towards the last of his life, though warned by his family physician. The medical referee of Pension Bureau, to whom appeal was taken for reversal of rejection by Pension Bureau, sustains the rejection. Rejected in 1886 by Commissioner Black.

NATHANIEL D. CHASE.

His claim in Pension Office begun June, 1864, renewed 1870, reopened 1880, and now pending, awaits further information and evidence to substantiate it. The Pension Bureau is competent to judge of his pensionability. Rejected in 1864 by Commissioner Barrett, and in 1882 by Commissioner Dudley.

HARRIET E. COOPER.

Her husband, a major, resigned 1863, on account of business affairs. Was afterward pensioned for rheumatism, and died twenty years afterward from chronic alcoholism, according to his attending physician's testimony, upon which rejection of her claim by Pension Office was based. The veto sustains action of Pension Office, which the bill endeavors to set aside.

WILLIAM M. CAMPBELL, JR.

Enlisted August 5, 1862, mustered out July 16, 1865, was a deserter for one year and seven months, and arrested and court-martialed. He alleges that in February, 1862, he contracted mumps from impure virus in vaccination. As he was not in United States service at that time, the proposed bill "seems neither to have law nor meritorious equity to support it." Rejected in 1880 by Commissioner Bentley.

VAN BUREN BROWN.

Eighteen years after discharge claimed pension, alleging various disabilities. His case, full of uncertainty and contradiction, was very thoroughly examined by Pension Bureau, rejected, subsequently reopened, re-examined, and again rejected. Three medical examinations failed to disclose any pensionable disability. Rejected by Commissioner Black in 1885 and 1887.

SARAH E. M'CALEB.

Her husband was discharged June, 1865. Died 1878 by suicide. No ground for pension shown. Rejected in 1883 by Commissioner Dudley.

DAVID A. SERVIS.

Alleges comrade put powder in his pipe, which exploded and injured his eyes; no record thereof or of any disability, although served two and a half years thereafter, when regiment was mustered out June, 1865. Never made claim until twenty-two years later.

ANNA MERTZ.

Her husband, who served as captain, resigned June, 1863. December 1, 1884, more than twenty years after his discharge, died from an overdose of morphine self-administered.

JOHANNA LOEWINGER.

Husband pensioned for chronic diarrhea, died July, 1876. A coroner's inquest found verdict of suicide by cutting his throat with a razor. His death was not caused by his military service.

STEPHEN SCHIEDEL.

Served from October, 1861, to October, 1864, without record of injury or disability. Sixteen years after discharge claimed pension, alleging injury to back and shoulder in June, 1862. Medical examinations disclosed injury to hand and arm and some rheumatic trouble all incurred since discharge, but do not sustain the injury for which he claimed pension. Death not result of military service.

ELISHA GRISWOLD.

Was discharged February, 1866. Filed claim 1880, alleging that while in prison in January, 1866, he fell from a swing and hurt his head and shoulder. No record of injury. Not result of army service. After this claim was rejected, in March, 1888, he filed another, alleging diarrhea and malarial poisoning.

CHARLES GLAMANN.

Served from September, 1864, to July, 1865; was injured in left arm by a brick thrown by a comrade in a personal altercation.

BRIDGET FOLEY.

Husband enlisted in August, 1862, and was discharged when he reached Washington for rheumatism contracted before he enlisted. He never applied for a pension, but died in 1873 of consumption. Cause of death had no relation to Army service.

TOBIAS BANEY.

Enlisted February, 1865, and was discharged in January, 1866. Claim for disability from palpitation of the heart. This case has been repeatedly examined by the Pension Bureau since 1878 and always rejected as unworthy. No reason why that Bureau's conclusion should not stand in this case as in others.

AMANDA F. DECK.

Husband was pensioned for a wound received in shoulder in an Indian fight in 1864. He was killed in 1883 in a personal difficulty not connected with his Army service.

THOMAS SHANNON.

Soldier in regular Army. While on leave at Rio Grande, Texas, in 1872, was injured by an explosion of powder at a 4th of July celebration. Rejected by Commissioner Baker.

THERESA HERBST.

Husband was in Union Army and captured by the Confederates at Gettysburgh. He then joined the rebel army and fought in its ranks for ten months, when he was taken prisoner by the Union forces. He died of heart disease in 1868. The President says:

"I will take no part in putting a name upon our pension-roll which represents a Union soldier found fighting against the cause he swore he would uphold; it would have been a sad condition of affairs if every captured Union soldier had deemed himself justified in fighting against his Government rather than to undergo the privations of capture."

JOHN F. BALLIER.

Claimant is now drawing under general law the full amount fixed by this bill.

WOODFORD M. HOUCHIN.

Disability is no wise attributable to Army service. The claim has been thoroughly examined and rejected by Commissioners Bentley, Dudley, and Black.

MARY FITZMORRIS.

The claimant is now receiving under general law the precise sum named in this bill.

APPENDIX B.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Spy, Republican.]

President Cleveland's reasons for declining to approve the dependent pension bill are sound and sufficient. If it should become a law it would enormously increase the annual expenditure for pensions, adding probably to the list of pensioners nearly or quite as many as are now enrolled. The bill would open great opportunities for fraud. Comparatively few of the added pensioners would be either needy or deserving, and many of them never saw an enemy or encountered any of the hardships or dangers of war. We believe it is a fact, though it is not generally known, that the amount paid annually by the United States in military pensions exceeds considerably the pay of the soldiers in any of the great European armies, and the amount has increased enormously for some years past, and is likely to grow rather than diminish for many years to come. It is right that veterans disabled in the service by wounds or disease should be liberally pensioned, and a grateful country will not grudge the expense, but the bill which the President declines to approve goes much further than that, and further than is reasonable or just.

[From the Boston Traveler, Stalwart Republican.]

President Cleveland in vetoing the dependent soldiers' pension bill has undoubtedly put himself in harmony with the overwhelming sentiment of the country. Whatever his motives may have been, the country is to be congratulated on his act. It is not regarded as probable that the bill can be passed over his veto. Many of those who voted for it in the first instance will hesitate to vote for it the second time. The enormous draft on the Treasury it would necessitate in the event of its becoming a law was not at first appreciated, and its defects and dangers were not understood.

[From the Hartford Courant, Republican, Senator HAWLEY's paper.]

The President has vetoed the dependent pension bill. After the reasons he has assigned for vetoing numerous individual pension bills, where the proof was not clear that the disability of the applicant was the result of service in the Army or Navy, he could not honestly find it possible to approve a general pension bill, which proposed to grant pensions by wholesale to persons unable to earn their support, whether or not their inability resulted from disease or injuries received in the service. This is an entirely new departure in the matter of pensions, except where many years have intervened, and one which does not receive the approval of the majority of the veterans of the war or of the public generally.

[From the Boston Transcript, Independent Republican.]

Whatever clamor is raised against President Cleveland for manfully discharging his duty by vetoing hasty and shambling legislation for the purpose of catching a few thousand soldier votes, will not survive a careful reading of the reasons which Mr. Cleveland gives as justifying his negative of the dependent pension bill.

The President discusses this whole question of pension granting in a dispassionate manner, as one who holds the scales fairly between the old soldier and the general community who must pay the taxes.

[From the Providence (R. I.) Journal, Independent Republican.]

The President has done himself credit by vetoing the dependent pension bill, and will earn more of the esteem of self-respecting veterans than the politicians who advocated and voted for it. The country can pardon a good many minor errors in a chief magistrate who has the courage to perform such an act of duty against clamor, misrepresentation, and mistaken sentiment. There will be no use in trying to make political capital out of the President's veto of the dependent pensions bill. The country has had such an experience with the arrears-of-pensions bill in the amount of the expense and the injurious effects upon the recipients of the bounty that it distrusts these measures and will approve their defeat. The President has done the country a good service, and will get the credit for his courage and patriotism from all right-thinking citizens irrespective of party.

[From the Buffalo Express, Republican.]

Undoubtedly the country is with him. The voice of the press is as truly the voice of the people as the voice of the people is the voice of God. The people of course include the old soldiers. Mr. Cleveland's veto nails the libelous lie that the majority or better element of veterans desired the passage of the pauper pension bill, which was an insult to their patriotism. The Democratic President proved a more watchful agent of the people than either the Democratic Representatives or the Republican Senators.

[From the Newark Daily Advertiser.]

It must be admitted that a bill so broad and generous, even lavish in its provisions as this is, must needs open a wide door to fraud and deception of various degrees of magnitude. Briefly, the bill is open to an indefinite variety of constructions. It was certain to encourage fraud. It would not reach so many of the deserving as of the undeserving.

[From the Philadelphia Press, Republican.]

Many of the President's criticisms to the bill are well founded. No one seems to know with certainty whether it would have cost the nation $5,000,000 or $50,000,000. The bill was drawn with such liberality and vagueness of language that there is grave reason to fear that had it or should it become a law it would impose upon the national Treasury a host of men who do not need or do not deserve this liberal bounty of a too lavish government.

[From the Philadelphia North American, Republican.]

President Cleveland's veto of the dependent pension bill will be heartily approved by the sober sense of the Republic. It will of course be condemned by those whom it disappoints, and unscrupulous demagogues of the baser sort may try to make party capital out of it. But thoughtful and intelligent citizens of both parties will rejoice that the President has had the moral courage to put this check upon a movement which threatened not only to bankrupt the Treasury but to demoralize the public mind, to destroy the spirit of manly independence in thousands of now self-supporting men, and to set the stigma of mendicancy and pauperism upon the honored veterans of the war of the rebellion.

[From the Philadelphia Telegraph, Republican.]

President Cleveland yesterday did what all good citizens, and especially all patriotic ex-soldiers and sailors, expected he would do when it was announced that the so-called dependent pension bill had finally passed both branches of Congress—the Senate without division and the House by a vote of 180 yeas to 76 nays—by sending in a veto message in which he discusses the whole subject at great length and gives abundant reasons why such a measure should not become a law. This bill is the worst and most extravagant of a number of excessively extravagant pension bills that have been enacted in a spirit of demagogism, and it is little better than an insult to every man who served in the Federal Army or Navy during the civil war for better reasons than those strictly relating to bounty, wages, and opportunities for plunder.

[From the Philadelphia Bulletin, Republican.]

President Cleveland's veto of the pauper pension bill will be generally approved. The measure was one of those pieces of hasty legislation, passed in deference to popular sentiment, with but little regard to consequences.

The veto message is a direct, logical document, questioning very properly the wisdom of adopting the service-pension principle, and exposing the faulty construction of the bill.

[From the Albany Express, Republican.]

The dependent-pension bill, which President Cleveland vetoed last week, is a measure that never should have passed, and would not, it seems to us, if Senators and Representatives had not deliberately shirked what many of them must have known and felt, and which some of them even admitted, to be a duty. Its passage resulted largely from moral cowardice—a common but most pernicious failing on the part, unfortunately, of too many public men. What would have happened if the President had been similarly weak we can all see very clearly, now that our attention has been particularly called to it. President Cleveland is, therefore, entitled to credit and thanks for the manly and sensible stand he has taken, and we are sure the country will applaud and sustain him in it. It is good to note, for once, that the political press of the country, without distinction of party, is substantially agreed in sustaining the President, and in giving him credit for firmness and courage at a time when those qualities were in great demand.

[From the Poughkeepsie Eagle, Republican.]

The people of the United States owe recognition to the courage of President Cleveland for his action in refusing to sign the dependent-pension bill. All parties desire to honor and treat fairly and liberally those who fought in defense of their country, but this has already been done. As the President says, history shows no record of any soldiers who were paid as well while in service, or who have been provided for as bountifully since their discharge. Nobody regrets this, and nobody thinks there has been too much done, but there is a limit to all things, and when the pension appropriation is equal to two-thirds of the cost of the entire military establishment of Germany, it is certainly time to stop.

[From the Utica Herald, Republican.]

President Cleveland vetoes the so-called dependent-pension bill. The principle which has governed pension legislation heretofore has been that pensions should be given only for wounds or disabilities incurred in Army or Navy service. This bill proposed an enlargement of the pension idea—to pension for service as well as for injuries received in service. It created a new class of pensioners, a class difficult of ascertainment. When this bill was before Congress nobody was able to tell how much money it would take from the Treasury. The chairman of the House Pension Committee thought it would cost not more than $6,000,000. When the arrears bill was before Congress official assurance was given that it would cost less than $25,000,000. It has cost at the present time $218,000,000. It is deemed a reasonable estimate that the dependent bill would add at least $70,000,000 annually to the pension payments. The claim agents would fatten anew on the opportunities so flexible a measure would present. Veterans all over the country have spoken out against this measure. There was perceptible nowhere, except among demagogues and claim agents, a demand for it.

[From the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, Republican.]

The dependent pension bill was passed by both Houses of Congress without very careful scrutiny, and its full bearings were not clearly understood by the country until it was in a fair way of becoming a law. The result of the general study of the measure that has been going on since then is that public sentiment, so far as it is reflected by the press of the country, is almost wholly against it. The objections to the measure raised by Republican and Democratic papers alike are substantially those set forth at length in the President's veto message. The bill was loosely drawn, and in its present form ought not to have received the approval of Congress.

[From the Rochester Herald, Republican.]

President Cleveland has vetoed the pauper pension bill which a truckling Congress passed. The premises are sound and the conclusions irresistible. Now, what is Congress going to do about it? There will undoubtedly be an effort to pass the bill over the veto, but it does not seem possible that it can succeed.

[From the Syracuse Journal, Republican.]

The nearly unanimous voice of the press of the country, reflecting the prevalent opinion, is heeded by the President in his veto of the dependent pension bill. Congress was not courageous enough to face the claim agents' lobby. Now that it has heard the voice of the nation it will not presume to exercise again the power it seemed to have, and a wholesome check will be put upon such sweeping pension legislation.

[From the Troy Times, Republican.]

The veto by the President of the dependent pension bill will be generally approved by public sentiment throughout the country. It was, indeed, the wisest act with which he can be credited during his administration thus far. For the position finally taken he deserves credit, and it will be freely extended to him on every hand. Dissatisfaction will find expression chiefly among the claim agents and attorneys who originated this intended "strike" upon the Treasury, and expected to make large gains by it.

[From the Paterson (N. J.) Press, Republican.]

The Press is willing to go as far as reason will allow in urging the granting of pensions to veterans of the Union Army. But it is a serious question whether justice to worthy veterans demands that the dependent pension bill, which has just been vetoed by the President, should be passed over the veto; and principally for this reason is it doubtful: The pension business, everybody knows who knows anything about it, is infected with abuses of a very grave character. In fact, it is a question whether under the operations of the pension ring the larger portion of the pensions appropriations does not now yearly fall into the hands of pension agents rather than go to the men who ought to be benefited. If it were possible to remove this notorious abuse of a generous nation's bounty, we do not believe that any really patriotic American would object to the very last degree of liberality in spending the surplus revenue in alleviating the wants of Union veterans or those dependent upon them, even though their needs might not be directly traceable to service in the Army or Navy of the Republic. How far, indeed, this dependent pension bill meets the approval of the best class of Union veterans is itself a question. It is a difficult problem to solve. On the whole, with such knowledge as we have on the subject, it seems to be better to have no further legislation of a general nature affecting pensions, but to allow applications to be dealt with on their individual merits.

[From the Norristown (Pa.) Herald, Republican.]

There is a very general disposition to give the President credit for his veto of the dependent pension bill. In fact, he seems to have made out a pretty case.

[From the Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph, Republican.]

In common fairness and justice to the President, we must heartily commend his action in vetoing the dependent pension bill. His veto messages are plain, straightforward, manly statements of facts, and should have weight with all fair-minded persons regardless of political bias. The matter of granting pensions has been carried to such an excess by Congress that it was absolutely necessary that a check should be put upon it, and the dependent pension bill offered just the opportunity needed.

It was a measure tending to foster greed at the expense of patriotism. We know that this is not the popular side of the question, but the side for the moment most popular is not necessarily the right side. Going to the root of the whole business, patriotism has very little to do nowadays with the passage of pension legislation. Congressmen long ago saw that it was an easy way to gain favor with the soldier element, and have carried it to an unreasonable and unjustifiable length, and President Cleveland does right in calling a halt.

[From the Wheeling (W. Va.) Intelligencer, Republican.]

Nobody was able to give any reliable estimate of the number of persons who would come forward as claimants under the dependent pension bill, and therefore it was impossible to form any idea of the amount of money that would be required to satisfy the claims. This is a fatal objection to the bill, and the President did well to veto it, notwithstanding it passed Congress by so large a majority. There is good reason to believe that many who voted for the measure in Congress did so in the belief that it would be vetoed. It is not possible that it will be passed over the veto.

[From the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette, Republican.]

The objection to the bill was that it opened the door for vast abuses. The way these could come to pass is strongly stated by the President.

[From the Cincinnati Times-Star, Republican.]

The pauper-pension bill was wrong in principle, and would have led to endless abuses in practice. It was not demanded by the soldiers who did the fighting, and who do not ask a penny in charity from the Government. In plain English it was "a levy on the rifle-pits for the benefit of the ambulance brigade," and any veteran knows what that means. It would have increased taxation by about $70,000,000 a year, but this was a secondary consideration not sufficient to condemn the bill had it been just. Pension laws need amending, but this would have been a dangerous departure.

[From the Minneapolis Journal, Republican.]

The President has vetoed the dependent-pension bill. That was a good place for a veto. Public sentiment will sustain this act of the Executive. It is generally regarded as unworthy of the country and a mark of ingratitude to hesitate to meet any demand made in the name of the veterans of the late war, but this measure seems to have been inspired more by a desire to revive the failing business of the pension agencies than to aid the dependent parents of veterans of the war.

[From the Chicago Tribune, Republican.]

President Cleveland's message returning the dependent-pension bill to Congress is by all odds the ablest state paper the President has written. The document is remarkable, indeed, for close, clear analysis, strong reasoning, and unimpeachable conclusions. Since the complete exposure the President has made of this loosely drawn and dangerous bill any Democrat who votes to pass it over the veto will very likely incur a judgment of political death at the hands of his party, and Republicans who yield it demagogic support will need much better reasons than they have yet made public to justify themselves before the people.

It was a courageous act for Mr. Cleveland to face the demagogues in Congress with the veto of a general outdoor-relief pension bill, but he has done it without hesitation, and justified himself at every point. The bill involves a "tremendous addition" to the burdens of the Government and the imposition on the laboring and tax-paying classes, and added to the present tax for pensions would make a load heavier than the support of any standing army in Europe. In point of demagogy, fraud, waste, injustice, and appalling expense to the people of the United States, this bill transcends anything ever passed in Congress, or by the Parliament of any other country. Let every man, whether he has been for or against the bill, read the veto message carefully before he expresses any opinion on the rightfulness of the Executive negative.

"THE PRESIDENT WAS RIGHT."

This is what George W. Childs says of the pension vetoes:

[From the Philadelphia Ledger, July 13.]

There have been but few Presidents of the United States who have so conspicuously displayed so high a degree of moral courage in the discharge of the duties of their office as Mr. Cleveland has done, and in nothing else has he exhibited his elevated sense of responsibility so much as in his vetoes of sundry private pension bills. This, which should have been universally recognized as meritorious, has been by many of his partisan opponents set down against him as an offense. His motives are impugned, his conduct misrepresented, and he is held up to the contumely of all those who have fought their country's battles as one who is indifferent to their valor, unappreciative of their services, opposed to conceding them the reward which is justly theirs.

There is nothing in the vetoes of the President to prove these grave charges; there is nothing in them to give even the color of credibility to them. So far have the President's political opponents pursued their opposition to him in this respect as to contend that his numerous vetoes of these private pension bills is a flagrant abuse of the constitutional exercise of the veto power, and an insult to the legislative department of the Government. That is as false a contention as could be made; the Constitution is mandatory to the effect that "every bill" passed by the House and Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States. If he shall approve it, he shall sign it; but if he shall not approve it, he shall return it to the House in which it originated, with his objections, and then the bill shall become law only by a vote of two-thirds of each House.

The known facts regarding these private pension bills similarly determine the propriety of the President's vetoes. He does what neither the Senate nor the House does; he devotes time, labor, and thought to the consideration of every separate pension bill presented to him, and according to their merits or defects he approves or disapproves them. In marked contrast with what the President has done in diligently, carefully inquiring into the merits of the bills presented to him for his approval is the unconsidered, reckless conduct of the Senate in passing them, illustrated by the uncontested statement of Senator BUTLER, in yesterday's debate, that in a single session of seventy minutes that body had passed 147 private pension bills.

In one of his veto messages last week the President said that the idea of Congress seems to be "that no man who served in the Army can be the subject of death or impaired health, except that they are chargeable to his service. Medical theories are set at naught, and the most startling relation is claimed between alleged incidents of military service and disability or death. Fatal apoplexy is admitted as the result of quite insignificant wounds, heart disease is attributed to chronic diarrhea, and suicide is traced to Army service in a wonderfully devious and circuitous way. * * * This course of special legislation acts very unfairly. Those with certain influence or friends to push their claims procure pensions, and those who have neither friends nor influence must be content with their fate under general laws."

All this is the truth, as case after case has established it, and yet the hue and cry of unscrupulous partisanship has so perverted the good conscience and devotion to duty of the President as to make him seem an enemy of the soldiers and his conduct an offense to them. No one who has read the President's veto messages in which he has stated his objections to those bills which he has disapproved can fail to perceive that he has, in every case, acted in entire good faith with respect to the claims of our soldiers. The pension list, he said, should be made a roll of honor, a record of the great, heroic deeds of brave men, and be not marred by the appearance of the names upon it of those who are unworthy of the distinction and benefits it should confer.

That the President was right, that Congress was wrong in the matter of the overwhelming proportion of the vetoed bills is proved by the fact that Congress has recognized, except in the very rarest instances, the validity of his objections. It was in its power to set aside his vetoes in any case if it were right and he wrong, but in how many cases has it done so? In so exceedingly small a number as to testify to his general wisdom, courage, and integrity in connection with these bills.

In this regard it is worth the while of the people to consider that there is something better than partisan supremacy; that fidelity shown in the administration of the Government is much better, and that there can be no partisan necessity so strong as to warrant the condemnation, through misrepresentation, of the Executive for doing that which it is his duty to do. In this private pension business the President has been engaged in correcting the errors of Congress. He has done it at the risk of having his motives misrepresented, his conduct denounced, his patriotism questioned, his popularity impaired; but, conscious of being right, determined to do right, he has gone resolutely on in the faithful discharge of his duty. That is what he should be encouraged to continue to do, and by no others more than by the brave men who fought the battles of their country, and who should now stand shoulder to shoulder with the Commander-in-Chief of the Army in his efforts to make the pension list a roll of honor and every pension certificate a token of valor and patriotism.

[General Sherman to the Grand Army, St. Louis, June 12, 1887.]

Honest men differ widely on this question of pensions to our old and feeble comrades. We all want to do what is right, but differ as to the means. All we know is that after twenty-odd years after the civil war the Government of the United States under Republican and Democratic rule pays out to our old soldiers of the Union Army about $60,000,000 per year and a few thousand to the Mexican war veterans, regardless of locality, and not one cent to the rebels of the South whom we fought in the civil war. We old soldiers of the civil war have not yet just cause to make an issue on the question of pensions to our infirm and wounded comrades. I advise you to go right along, prepare the way for the Grand Army of the Republic at its session of Wednesday, September 28, 1887, at St. Louis, and receive them as they deserve, as honored guests; also, the President of the United States, with such other honored guests as may grace the occasion. If any of our comrades feel hurt at the association, they can remain at home, but the sun will rise each morning, the seasons will follow each other in quick succession, and the world with its myriads of people will go right along just the same.

The bill was very imperfect—said ex-Congressman Negley, of Pensylvania, a leading Republican of that State—and the President, I think, showed mature judgment in writing the veto he did.

General H. V. Boynton, the veteran Republican correspondent at Washington, who was a brave soldier during the war, talks in a similar strain:

To me the bill seems to be a mixture of good and bad, with the bad predominating. The claims of dependent parents do not need argument. There is also a large class of dependent soldiers, many—to the disgrace of the country—in poor-houses; many more dependent on relations, who, however willing, are sorely burdened with their charge. A nation which has been saved by the aid of such men ought not to hesitate to contribute liberally to their support. But the trouble is that while the bill aids these classes, it also opens a wide door for the undeserving, the shirks, and similar classes, with whom good soldiers have nothing in common. The pernicious features of the bill are such as now constantly arise from that view of a pension bill which prompts too many politicians to ask as the first question how a bill can be framed to catch the most votes, either for themselves or their party. With such attempts at legislation the honorable soldiers of the country never had the least sympathy.

[Harrisburg corrrespondence Pittsburgh Dispatch, Republican.]

QUAY WOULD SUSTAIN CLEVELAND'S VETO.

Colonel QUAY received a letter to-day from a corporal in his old regiment, a man who was pretty thoroughly shot to pieces in the war, asking him to oppose any attempt to pass the dependent-pension bill over the President's veto.
